Dr. Magdalena Molina Riofrío

Technical Secretary of Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security

The Government of the Citizen Revolution of the economist Rafael Correa, Constitutional President of the Republic of Ecuador, its fundamental axis is to transform the neoliberal political system, which has exacerbated inequality and corruption, to transform it into a system of deepening democracy in all areas that correspond to the Ecuadorian State, from the access of its citizens to social rights basic rights, to justice, equity, access to development opportunities, to the participation of a solidarity economy; that is to say: to good living with quality of life, dignity and sustainable development. These advances require, at the same time, the transformation of Ecuador's security system, which was designed at the time of the National Security Doctrine, a militaristic and repressive doctrine, designed for the border defense of the territories and for the suppression, with a police character, of the groups that allegedly threatened public order. This doctrine, which would be applied throughout the continent during the Cold War era, allowed the forces of security will act against internal threats, with confrontations against individuals or political groups of an insurgent or opposition nature.

Today, in the 21st century, Ecuador advances with new vigor, with the new democratic horizons of a new homeland. As an intrinsic part of this new democratic model, which gives rise to transformative policies, the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security of Ecuador has undertaken a coordination and articulation effort to achieve a transformation, in accordance with the policies of the current National Government and the National Development Plan. It closely coordinates the institutions that are part of the Security Cabinet: Ministry of National Defense, Ministry of Government and Police, Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade, Ministry of Justice and Human Rights, National Anti-Corruption Secretariat, Technical Secretariat of Plan Ecuador, and the Technical Secretariat for Risk Management, (the latter two are secretariats attached to the Ministry of Security Coordination) institutional bodies that, due to their legal nature, have the mandate to promote and implement public policies to protect the internal and external security of the country. and that of its principal, which is the Ecuadorian people, in their respective spheres of government management.

Within these commitments of the Government of the Citizen Revolution, the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security, with the institutions of its cabinet, promotes the new policy of Security, Sovereignty and Democracy, as a policy of the Ecuadorian State with a democratic vision and of human rights, corresponding to the challenges of the Century XXI, and the global security policy that rages to justify the violation of the sovereignty of peoples, under the pretext of the fight against terrorism.

Objective of the Agenda

Build the National Agenda for Internal and External Security through dialogue and consultation with citizens, State institutions and organizations from different sectors of civil society with a vision of security, sovereignty and democracy.

This new security policy is institutionalized as a State policy to lay the foundations and democratic principles that renew the national doctrine of internal and external security, under the principles of human rights, established in the Constitution of the Republic of Ecuador; international law that safeguards the right to non-intervention and sovereignty of peoples, and international humanitarian law.

Under this projection, the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security designed the project Construction of the Security Agenda with a focus on Sovereignty, Human Rights and Democracy. The management of this process, in active and purposeful coordination with the institutions that make up the Security Cabinet, has focused on the task of promoting a democratic methodology with citizen and inter-institutional participation mechanisms. It started, in its first phase, with the completion of the National Survey on the perception of citizens on internal and external security, aimed at the various citizen sectors, both in urban and rural areas of the country. The following phases have been carried out in consecutive dialogues, under the modality of regional forums and work groups. Methodologies and modalities that opened the opportunity to debate and agree on the different areas of internal and external security, in order to guarantee that this new security policy is the result of the consensus of civil society with State institutions. The proposals collected give the guidelines for the new security policy, on ranía and democracy, and will be transformed into public policies and action plans that will be part of the Security Agenda of the Citizenship and the Ecuadorian State. This process constitutes the reaffirmation of the Ecuadorian citizen revolution; strengthens, in practice, participatory democracy, the validity of the Social State of Law; and imprints a Latin American integrationist internal and external security policy that starts from their own common interests in the construction of territories of peace, solidarity, dignity and sovereignty, thus joining the efforts of the region that are emerging today with clarity and self-identity.

The National Agenda for Internal and External Security, collected in this book, raises the comprehensive concept of security, sovereignty and democracy, as State policy. This philosophical compendium and strategic guidelines contains democratic methodological concepts towards where and how we want to implement the new security model, in the context of the globalized world, also projecting it for future generations.

In Chapter I, the process of the construction of the Security Agenda is analyzed, in which the democratic methodology and the phases carried out that were designed from the conception of this great project are exposed, which wants to achieve the extraordinary result of the dialogue and coordination with quality and massive citizen participation, local governments and other institutions and organizations of civil society, and in the results of the National Survey on Citizen Perceptions on Internal and External Security Issues.

Chapter II focuses on an objective evaluation of the current situation regarding security aspects in Ecuador as challenges; and in the proposals from the Coordinating Minister Gustavo Larrea "Towards a New Policy of Security Sovereignty and Democracy" outlining strategic guidelines for each of the areas of internal and external security with great democratic content and a focus on human rights.

Chapter III introduces us to a brief history of Security in Latin America This chapter introduces us to the beginning of the reflections on the different concepts, theories, and models of security, in the different stages of hemispheric security during the Cold War, sheltered under the paradigm of regional security, and post-Cold War, up to the present time, in which new alternatives appear, such as the recent proposal from Brazil on the creation of the South American Defense Council.

Chapter IV focuses on a brief analysis of Security in Ecuador. It is a historical review of how security was conceived from the republican era until the transformation of the new democratic stage in Ecuador, and the process of building the Government of the Citizen Revolution.

The conceptual, philosophical and doctrinal proposal towards the new Security, Sovereignty and Democracy Policy, is exposed in Chapter 5 of this book, which lays the doctrinal foundations for the Internal and External Security Agenda, whose strategic guidelines are collected from systematically in each of the security areas, and which were enriched in the Regional Forums.

The National Security Agenda is also duly exposed in the sectoral Institutional Agendas included in the attached fascicles, proposals prepared by each of the institutions that are part of the Security Cabinet.

The National Security Agenda arises, then, from the collection of the set of proposals and strategic guidelines of the citizenry in democratic dialogue and agreement with the State institutions that with they regulate, within their mandate and institutional planning, internal and external security aspects of the country.

As Minister Gustavo Larrea has indicated, the process of construction of the National Agenda for Internal and External Security is a historical fact, unprecedented in the country, due to its nature of convocation and for revolutionizing the doctrinal concepts of security that have been maintained up to the present date. The construction of the National Security Agenda also promoted the foundations of a new security doctrine with a human philosophy of rights and sovereignty, recognizing the global context that encompasses the comprehensive security model proposed in this process, to guarantee the “good living”, democracy, and peace.

The philosophy and the new doctrine that is promoted in this proposal and that has the validation of the citizens, in accordance with the public policies of the bodies related to the issue of the Ecuadorian State, therefore constitute the basic principles for the formulation of the Security, Sovereignty and Democracy Law and the Internal and External Security System as an inter- and intra-institutional body, synergistic and with its own democratic dynamism to guarantee feedback between the State and citizens.

We reiterate what was collected in the forums with the public. there can be no development without security, nor security without development; there can be no peace without security, nor security if we do not guarantee peace and peaceful coexistence and a culture of peace and solidarity; there can be no security without being in harmony with nature; There can be no security unless the causes of insecurity are eliminated, and there can be no regional or global security unless we join efforts to identify our internal problems and those that are common, to face them with our own identity, in the face of external or imposed threats. that counteract or threaten our internal interests and the interests of our Latin American region.

I. Construction Process of the Internal and External Security Agenda

The construction process of the National Agenda for Internal and External Security occurred in a sequence of democratic methodological phases; from the design of the project, the identification of the participatory phases, the elaboration of democratic methodologies, the broad, inter-institutional and citizen coordination mechanisms and, concluded, with agreed proposals to put together the National Security Agenda. This great task was carried out through the leadership and executive direction of the Technical Secretary of the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security. The participation and active follow-up of the Coordinating Minister for Internal and External Security, Gustavo Larrea, an expert in human rights, made it possible to refine the scaffolding of concepts and theories on the subject, and managed to break with the security paradigms in force to date. It was proposed to advance with long-range proposals so that they have an impact in space and time for future generations. This is how the approach of going towards a State policy of security, sovereignty and democracy was born.

that allows us to draw a main objective: the consolidation of Ecuadorian democracy, whose central axis is the human being, the citizen, equity, justice, human rights, sovereignty and respect for the Rule of Law. These principles are the fundamental pillars of the Government Plan and, at the same time, constitute the objectives of the National Secretariat for Planning and Development, SENPLADES.

The process of construction of the Security Agenda was contextualized as the ideal mechanism to promote participatory democracy through dialogues and social agreement around the analyzes and proposals on public policies and strategies for the elaboration and implementation of the Internal and External Security Agenda. This process has also contributed to building a culture of co-responsibility between citizens and the State, in matters inherent to the internal and external security of the country.

This great challenge and significant result, which has produced the Security Agenda, would not have been possible without the institutional commitment of the Ministers and Secretaries of the State portfolios that are part of the Security Cabinet. The tenacious work of the technical teams and coordinators, professionals from each institution, started progressively (in their involvement) and then overflowed in a synergistic and dynamic process, incorporating the democratic methodology in their discussion, analysis and agreement meetings to the design and/or review of its policies and action plans with a new perspective and a new focus on security, sovereignty and democracy, assimilating it as the transversal axis in its institutional management, and in its citizen-State relations for the implementation of the Security Agenda and future planning and governance actions.

1.1 Democratic Methodology

The process of implementing the democratic methodology took place through a methodological design agreed upon with the coordinating team and with the authorities of the institutions that are part of the Security Cabinet. This involvement allowed us to obtain the extraordinary success that today is a legacy that is expressed in the archives of the massive and qualitative participation of the citizenry, in each of the nine regional forums (which were held in the main regions of the country). Approximately three thousand participants, as representatives of civil society organizations, which include youth sectors, women, community leaders, local government authorities, the indigenous sector, Afro-descendants, the business, academic, and state sectors; members of the Armed Forces and the National Police; all of them enthusiastically and creatively participated in this process throughout the country for the construction of the Security Agenda.

Another of the essential aspects of the democratic methodology was its multidimensional character. The proposal of Ecuador and of the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security in particular, was shared and enriched at the International Forum on Security, Sovereignty and Democracy from a regional perspective. This forum was attended by Nilda Garré, Minister of Defense of the Republic of Argentina, Jennifer McCoy, Regional Director of the Carter Center and Juan de Dios Parra, General Director of the Latin American Association for Human Rights. The thesis was debated from the perspective of regional integration and human rights as central axes in the new doctrinal conception of security.

Chapter VI details the democratic methodology and the strategic guidelines for public policies on internal and external security.

1.2 Results of the processes of construction of the Security Agenda

Institutional results:

These tangible results are evident in the transversality of this new security policy in institutional policies, in their strategic agendas and in the management plans of each one of the institutions of the Security Cabinet. Policies and action plans that are duly exposed in the fascicles that are presented with this compendium of the Internal and External Security Agenda.

The institutional policies and plans were exposed in a consultative manner in each of the Forums and work tables, which allowed the institutions to

The Regional Forums were held in the capital cities of the provinces of Imbabura, Sucumbíos, Pichincha, Loja, Chimborazo, Guayas and Esmeraldas. Whose capitals became the regional strategic focal point of the surrounding provinces covering the entire national territory. This regionalization of the debate allowed the democratic participation of the Ecuadorian citizenry.

Government institutions refine, reaffirm and in some cases modify their methodologies for the application of policies, plans and programs concerning security and participatory democracy. Around 89% of the participants had, for the first time, the opportunity to learn about and analyze the concept and/or vision of security and its relationship with the rights of citizenship, with sovereignty and democracy, justice, and safety in harmony with nature. Situation that allowed opening the educational process on issues that concern the security and sovereignty of the population and the Ecuadorian State.

Proposals for Strategic Guidelines in Areas of Security

Results of the Forums: Basic consensus emerged from the dialogues on strategic guidelines for the internal and external security of the country. In annex 2 we present a systematized table of the strategic guidelines collected in the regional forums. Below we illustrate certain relevant aspects:

Public security

The dialogue and strategies focused on the application of the National Police Modernization Plan and the Citizen Security Plan.

- It is everyone's responsibility, the State and the citizens in their set.
- It is the empowerment of citizens to evaluate local management on issues of internal security. • It is the planning and coordination between authorities and citizens to eliminate crime and other elements of insecurity.

Security and International Relations

Issues related to how to optimize international relations that respond to our interests as a country and as a region, embodied in bilateral and multilateral policies, were addressed.

- Generation of binational citizen oversight on environmental matters.
- Application of international treaties that safeguard the sovereignty and territory of States.
- Respect for the rights of legal, displaced and refugee immigrants. Colombian soldiers in Ecuador.
- Development of the Positive Agenda of the border regions with basic services, agricultural resources to avoid drug cultivation.

Security and Defense

The thesis of creating a single South American regional security bloc, to face conflicting interests, was a common denominator from the perspective of having a clear policy to prevent external threats to internal regional interests:

- Generation of a geopolitical culture and defense and Latino unity meriacana through education.
- Powers and roles of the State institutions responsible for security: Armed Forces, in charge of external security, and the National Police, in charge of internal security.
- Development of an implementation plan for UN resolution 1325 between the National Council of Women and the Ministry of Defense.
- Generation of a defense policy centered on the human being, participatory democracy, and citizen responsibility.

Security, Justice and Human Rights:

- Dissemination of rights at all educational levels.
- Promotion of the Public Defender's Office to provide advice gratuitous.
- Free clinics for the sponsorship of vulnerable groups.
- Creation of work, education, arts and sports establishments in the Rehabilitation Centers.

Security, Risk Management

- Creation of decentralized Risk Management systems.
- Training on risk management at all levels: formal education and communication campaigns.
- Creation of citizen spaces for the control of risk management, as disseminators of information.

Security and Ecuador Plan

The common denominator, in the work tables, is the shielding of the "fronts teras with development":

- Strengthening of the military and police presence on the northern border.
- Promotion of alternative economic activities for the population of border.
- Promote the technical capacity to present productive projects, development.
- Strengthening of border community organizations and the promotion of common agendas.

1.3 Contextual and Operational Vision of the Security Agenda

The strategic guidelines are part of the contextual and operational vision of the Internal and External Security Agenda. Many of these strategic recommendations are included in the plans and programs of the institutions that make up the Security Cabinet. What has been achieved through the forums is the validation of these policies and operational plans, with great added value: the incorporation of synergy and harmonization of their policies and operational plans with a comprehensive vision of the new security policy, sovereignty and democracy; the deepening of democracy, the revaluation of sovereignty, the affirmation of the borders of peace, and the full validity of the rule of law.

The sustainability of the Internal and External Agenda will be based on the creation of an institutional and inter-institutional follow-up, monitoring and evaluation system of its Strategic Agendas, Plans and Programs, which will be based on real indicators to measure the achievement of their goals in terms of public policies and the National Development Plan in the field of security, sovereignty and democracy.

The evaluation systems will be based on the mechanisms of citizen participation, sovereignty in its context of human dignity, regional integration and communication policies in order to stimulate the Internal and External Security Agenda as a constant process of evolution and changes that are required to strengthen the institutional framework of security with a focus on the principles of sovereignty and democracy; and of the integral vision for the internal and external security of the Country.

Contextualization of Internal Security and External and its Integral Vision

The Internal and External Security Agenda contextualizes integral security as the new State policy, understood as the integral vision of human security, cooperative security and other multidimensional visions in the order of integrality to protect the interests of security internal and external of the country, in which the human being is the central axis of security.

Comprehensive security comprises the set of actions of the State and Civil Society that in a harmonious and interdisciplinary way revolutionize security from a comprehensive and multidimensional vision to safeguard and guarantee the principles related to human rights, governability, the strengthening of democracy, freedoms, people's rights to good living, reciprocal assistance and solidarity security among peoples, promoting Latin American integration, South-South relations and global security.*

The unity of the efforts carried out in the Latin American region demand a continuous debate to achieve the unification of criteria in order to promote democratic consensus on integration policies on security, defense, sovereignty and democracy. The "Internal and External Security Agenda of Ecuador" lays the foundations of a new doctrine of security, sovereignty and democracy with an integral vision. Without a doubt, it will be a transcendental contribution to the construction of a new security doctrine in the Latin American Region.

Our integral conception of security has new scopes in the objective, dynamic and multidimensional understanding. This new comprehensive security proposal encompasses all the principles related to human rights, the rights of good living for citizens. A sovereignty where human dignity prevails, in its real scope, the dignity of States, of their territories, where territories of peace are forged, and, with equal priority, democracy. Where greater democracy is guaranteed through the systematic participation of citizens and the State for the construction and implementation of the Security Agenda and Policy in a symmetry of actions and philosophies that encompass the new security doctrine, and build At the same time, a new culture of co-responsibility between citizens and the State affirmed in the strengthening of democracy and the rule of law that eliminates fears and threats of insecurity, both in the subjective elements and the causal phenomena of security.

The National Security Agenda of Ecuador cannot ignore a substantial aspect of the Citizen Revolution and the participatory process: democracy understood as equal opportunities for all. The security of the 21st century must have its support and its raison d'être in democratic, socially participatory systems, since only in this scenario are the full enjoyment and exercise of the individual and collective rights of a participatory democracy guaranteed.

II. Towards a New Internal and External Security Policy

Gustavo Larrea
Coordinating Minister of Internal and External Security

2.1 Security, Sovereignty and Democracy, XXI Century

Discussing a security, sovereignty and democracy agenda is, without a doubt, an unprecedented event in Ecuador, because the agendas of the different ministries and secretariats in charge of security issues, in previous administrations, have been fundamentally prepared by those institutions. in a disjointed way (and without the participation of the citizenry).

Hence the importance of this process of building the Internal and External Security Agenda, through the holding of forums and events, in the different regions of the country, with the participation of local authorities and leaders of civil organizations.

The forums have been held in the city of Ibarra with the participation of the provinces of Imbabura and Carchi; in Lago Agrio, Nueva Loja, with the intervention of Sucumbíos, Orellana and Napo; in Quito with the participation of Pichincha, Tungurahua, Pastaza, Cotopaxi and Santo Domingo de los Tsáchilas; in Loja with the intervention of the provinces of Loja, El Oro, (Morona) and Zamora; in Guayaquil with the participation of Guayas, Manabí, Los Ríos and Santa Elena; and in the city of Esmeraldas. The objective is that the population of each of the regions can participate in this debate and provide information on the problems of each of these provinces and cantons of our country.

This brings us to the launch of the Security Agenda on September 18 of this year. It is a process that we have been working on in each of the institutions with enormous effort. We have now spent a year debating, discussing and executing the National Police Modernization Plan, the Anti-Corruption Plan, the Ecuador Plan and its work agenda, and the creation of the Technical Secretariat for Risk Management, an important advance to lead to State policy, risk management. In short, each of the State portfolios has been working in that direction.

Security Challenges in Ecuador

Internal security

What are the problems we face? The lack of a strategic agenda for security, sovereignty and democracy for the construction of an internal and external security system that articulates all institutional and citizen efforts to build a society of peace and free of violence. In this area we face problems such as organized crime, which includes drug trafficking, kidnapping for extortion, hit men, bank robberies, and common crime. Internal security is affected by the lack of investment of fiscal resources in equipment for the National Police.

The first aspect, which corresponds to organized crime, covers criminal phenomena unknown in our country until the end of the 1990s, when in Ecuador there was one kidnapping per year and it was not kidnapping for extortion, and drug trafficking was not a problem. fundamental that affected Ecuadorian society.

However, since the mid-1990s, an enormous effort has been made to keep Ecuador free of illicit crops, since drug traffickers permanently try to establish themselves in the country through the promotion of coca leaf crops. In this sense, there has been a constant policy of eradicating crops and combating drug trafficking. A few months ago we eradicated 12 hectares of coca crops. Ecuador maintains a struggle in this field, but also at the level of captures, since the country captures an average of 26 tons, 26 thousand kilos per year, of cocaine.

We have disagreed with the United States Drug Enforcement Agency on how to handle anti-narcotics policy, because we consider that they have failures: drug use in developed countries has not decreased, nor has drug cultivation in Colombia, Peru, and Bolivia. And why do we consider these as errors? Because, for example, they, in their cooperation agreements, establish, as a measurement parameter, the number of catches made. That is to say, if in the country 2,000 people are captured who carried 100, 200 or 500 grams or one kilo, that is the measure of efficiency. We take as a measure of efficiency how many organized crime gangs we dismantle, this does not necessarily imply arresting drug couriers, but rather doing monitoring and intelligence work that allows us to reach the network, capture it and dismantle it. Since last year, we have had tremendous successes. Five cartels, linked to Mexico's Sinaloa cartel and the Cali and Medellín cartels, were captured and dismantled. This is a conquest in the fight against drugs.

We must strengthen that success but also the fight against kidnappings. Last year, out of 36 kidnappings for extortion, in which ransoms of between US$200,000 and US$5,000,000 were requested, all the kidnapped were released alive, not a single dollar was paid and the 35 gangs were captured and dismantled. The only ransom was paid by a family that decided not to count on the collaboration of the National Police.

Regarding the phenomenon of kidnapping, in the 1990s, Ecuador had to face waves of kidnapping for extortion that have affected us up to now. We had to create a specialized anti-kidnapping Police, which has been gaining experience and success in its management. However, kidnapping continues to be a criminal phenomenon to which the structure of the Ecuadorian State is not adapted, since it is not a crime that comes from the Ecuadorian social structure itself, but a crime of international crime that comes to our country, just as drug laundering and illegal money laundering that forced us to create the "Law against Money Laundering" and the Financial Intelligence Unit.

Common crime is different from organized crime. Organized crime does not come from poverty, it comes from the middle and upper classes of society. It is not possible to launder 10, 15, 20 million dollars from a pickpocket; this happens in the upper layers of society. Kidnapping for extortion implies planning and the intervention of an intelligence team, an operational team and a negotiation team, and, without a doubt, a level of organization; These crimes, like corruption, do not come from the phenomenon of poverty. But common crime is a phenomenon that is closely linked to problems of social deterioration, lack of opportunities, education, health and employment. The phenomenon of common crime must also be combated in the area of economic and social development.

Security and National Sovereignty

Another external security phenomenon that we also face is the violation of our national sovereignty, with military incursions; air, land, and fluvial forces of regular and irregular forces, which fundamentally affect our northern border, in the provinces of Sucumbios, Carchi, and Esmeraldas. And that had its highest point with the bombing and Colombian military incursion on March 1, 2008.

Once the war with Peru ended and peace was signed ten years ago, no more investments were made in national defense, from there we faced problems with the obsolescence of part of our defensive arsenal.

Justice and human rights

The non-existence of the public defender's office—which violated due process— forced us, through an emergency decree, to create a public defender's department attached to the Ministry of Justice to allow citizens to have the right to defense . In this way, in the last eight months, 2,000 citizens who were imprisoned without having been responsible, or whose sentence had already been served, were released.

Other problems are politicized justice, impunity, legal insecurity and the lack of a social rehabilitation policy in which prisons are not schools for crime and recruitment sites for organized crime gangs. This led us to the creation of the Ministry of Justice and Human Rights and, based on the resolution of the Constituent Assembly and the reform of the law, this ministry, in turn, presided over the Social Rehabilitation Council. It is also necessary to promote, as we will see later, a State policy on social rehabilitation.

Limited or no attention to crime victims. When a crime occurs, in the best of cases, the Police arrive; but, sometimes, it is late due to the lack of equipment, communication, patrolmen, and that is where the problem lies. In addition, there is no legal, medical and psychological assistance and care service for crime victims.

Corruption and impunity

They include bribes in public purchases, given the lack of transparency in state contracts. Tax evasion for which, even years ago, advertising campaigns were promoted for non-payment of taxes cough and in favor of evasion. Smuggling, which affects national production and affects the creation of jobs. Corruption in banking sectors, which led to the bankruptcy of more than half of the financial system.

Risks and catastrophes

The problems caused by global warming generate more and more frequent impacts on our lives; environmental risks, volcanic eruptions, floods, etc. There is no risk prevention policy, there is only a reactive policy against natural phenomena that makes us act when the phenomenon occurs, but there is no State policy for risk prevention. For this reason, the majority of municipalities, beyond their will, do not even have risk maps to know where they authorize or not the construction of houses. The construction of schools, hospitals in risk areas, the construction of roads below the level is approved, which has caused the flooding of the roads when floods occur on the Ecuadorian coast. The lack of care of the hydrographic basins, both in the eastern and western Andes mountains, has caused gravel and lava to flow down towards the Amazon and the coast due to deforestation, clogging the rivers and generating phenomena more complex environmental conditions, such as overflow and flooding.

Northern border

Some problems in this border area are the incursions of regular and irregular military forces, drug trafficking, attempts to establish illegal plantations in our country, arms trafficking, chemical precursors and explosives, and the presence of organized crime, which, in In 2006, in the province of Sucumbíos, it produced more than 200 murders by hit men – most of those murdered are Colombian nationals. We have dealt with this situation successfully. Last year they were reduced to six cases of commissioned murder or contract killings in the province of Sucumbíos, thanks to a greater presence of the National Police in terms of intelligence and operational capacity. But, also, there are the problems of poverty on the border; This situation requires a response in terms of security, understood not only as coercive police and military actions, but also as economic and social development actions.

International security challenges

This presents us with new international political challenges and new sociopolitical phenomena, such as the massive displacement of Colombians, the same number that already exceeds 350,000, and the presence of refugees, the same number that currently number 17,000, not counting 35,000. who are in the refugee process. These phenomena put pressure on our country, and there is very little collaboration from the international community in this reg

The lack of Latin American unity is another problem. The fact that our countries, despite belonging to the same region, have lived with their backs to each other, has deprived us of political, economic and social capacity in the international arena, which has been reflected in attacks on our national sovereignty in foreign policy.

Considering this brief previous diagnosis, on internal and external security, the policy that we propose is security, sovereignty and democracy within the framework of respect for human rights and the consolidation of Ecuador as a territory of peace.

Proposal

The objective that we set ourselves is to build the Security, Sovereignty and Democracy Agenda, based on dialogue and agreement between citizens and the State.

Towards a Security Policy, Sovereignty and Democracy

Improve the efficiency of internal security

The goal is a safer society without fear. For this we have to reduce the number of crimes, so it is essential to modernize the National Police in terms of technological equipment, crime laboratories, communication, transportation, training; strengthen the community Police as a police close to the citizenry; fight against common crime, against drug trafficking and organized crime. This reminds us that, despite being a leader in the fight against drug trafficking and being an Andean country with zero illicit crops, Ecuador is the country that receives the least international cooperation. Colombia, which is the largest producer, receives US$600 million; Peru, US$100,000,000; Bolivia, US$60,000,000.

Ecuador barely receives US$3,000,000, despite being the leader in Latin America, not only for not having allowed drug crops to settle in the country, but also for maintaining a policy of zero tolerance for drug trafficking.

The Security Agenda implies revaluing the role of the police in Ecuadorian society, that is, considering them as a citizen who is a fundamental part of security work, of community participation in the security of neighborhoods, precincts, and communities through through the community police. It also implies eradicating and not tolerating corruption and the violation of human rights by any "police citizen", granting them the right to vote like all "citizens".

External Security and National Defense

As for the Armed Forces, it is necessary to improve our deterrent and defensive capacity through modernization and equipment.

Develop a new doctrine of National Security and Defense and a new Law of Defense and National Sovereignty. Likewise, to citizenize the Armed Forces so that the soldier citizen, the military citizen, has the right to vote, with responsibility for their actions.

We will promote and support the participation of our Armed Forces in the Latin American Defense Council, which should create an additional branch of that security council, since risk management at the Latin American level is also part of its policy.

Security and Foreign Policy

In foreign policy, it is necessary to maintain our leadership in international humanitarian law. We cannot forget that we have 50,000 displaced persons and close to 350,000 refugees.

It is necessary to promote the Union of the South, UNASUR, to strengthen our international policy of non-intervention and respect for the self-determination of peoples. The Latin American initiative against drug trafficking and organized crime will be an initiative promoted by the Ecuadorian State for being a leader on this issue. Foreign military bases will not be allowed in our national territory.

Security Justice and Human Rights

In terms of justice and human rights, we have already made progress in the public defender's office, institutionalized in the new Constitution. The Ministry of Justice has made important advances in the Public Defender's Office Law, social rehabilitation, and investment in new centers. The centers in Santo Domingo de los Tsáchilas and Esmeraldas are currently in the rehabilitation process, and the one in Nueva Loja is under construction. But that is not the only thing, the rehabilitation policy is being changed, it is sought that the inmate has the possibility of becoming literate if he was not already literate, and of finishing school, college, university, and even of accessing a postgraduate course. ; that i can work in the rehabilitation center and carry out sports, recreational and artistic activities, such as literature, cinema and theatre. In other words, a social rehabilitation policy in which prison is not a school for organized crime.

The Ministry of Justice and Human Rights also promotes legal, medical, and psychological care for crime victims; a novelty in the whole world since, for the first time, there will be a policy of this type and, in short, it is a very important advance. The administration of justice is supported, precisely in two areas in order to expand the resolution capacity of what should be timely justice, given that Ecuadorian justice is not and needs to receive support from the Executive to expand the number of courts in the different provinces and cantons where it is necessary to expedite the justice administration system. The new Constitution clearly foresees this process of depoliticization and full autonomy of the Executive, Judicial and Legislative powers; In addition, justices of the peace will be created to resolve conflicts in the community.

Security and Anti-Corruption

Regarding the fight against corruption, training in human values must be promoted both in the educational system and through the media.

communication. That culture of making easy money, that culture that values human beings for how much they have and not for what they are, that ideology of neoliberalism that privileged having before being, is one of the facts that have deteriorated ethical values and morals in our society. We believe that we must recover the historical values of our country in terms of honesty and transparency. The public service is that, public, it is not a private business. Those who want to do business that set up their company and “have a nice time”; the Public Administration must be completely transparent.

There is corruption not only in public officials who accept a bribe, but also in the businessman who gives it. That is why the fight has two fronts and is in education, the communication of human values and field research, such as the one carried out by the Anti-Corruption Secretariat and the action so that cases that are in impunity are resolved. It is not possible that there are debts of hundreds of millions of dollars and the Ecuadorian State turns a blind eye to not collect those debts. Debts must be collected and creditors must be paid. It is not possible for citizens to have their savings and resources taken away. At the legal level, it is necessary to reform the Money Laundering Law, to strengthen the fight against Illicit Enrichment.

In addition to education and communication of values, the construction of a tax culture and mechanisms to avoid corruption are required. To this end, the public procurement system is promoted through public auctions on the Internet, which makes the contest and the call transparent and prevents corruption. The single account of the national treasury was also established, this avoids the possibility of bribery in the payment to State suppliers, with the automatic transfer of resources

Security and Risk Management

Regarding risk management, we believe that it is important to first reflect on the environmental problems that affect the planet. Risk management is not just a problem that deals with sporadic natural phenomena, but a global problem: global warming. The possibility of the human species and all forms of life collapsing on planet Earth implies a new vision of harmony with nature.

After two centuries, the exploitation of the environment and the fact that the two most important ideologies of those 200 years, the liberal and the Marxist, raised the domination of man over nature, today we must raise

We love the harmony of the human being with his habitat, and this principle is fundamental. It is therefore important to consider that nature has rights and needs to be respected. And that is not a decree, it is not that overnight we are going to have a country with zero environmental pollution. This is a process that we must build day by day, since it implies a risk management policy; It also implies preparing the State policy for Risk Management, it implies that each municipality has its risk plan and knows where and to whom to authorize the construction of houses, urbanizations and roads. Likewise, the prefectures, ministries and public entities must have risk management and prevention as part of their policy so as not to have the problems that we always suffer, that is, the phenomenon comes and we have a reactive policy, but rather prevent to face the risks.

Plan Ecuador, Frontiers of Peace

The Ecuador Plan is specific to the problem we face in the border area. It is a comprehensive plan; Socially, it attends to problems such as identity cards, land legalization, education and health, in many sectors of the border where the State has never arrived and where, at best, Army patrols have been seen passing by, it is the fact that now the State begins a process of presence in the area, of solidarity presence and that it considers these brothers and sisters "citizens". Arriving with medical brigades, arriving with brigades for land legalization, arriving with productive projects, credit, technical assistance, marketing assistance, arriving with education, school and college literacy will undoubtedly change the Northern Border. But the objective is to also come up with productive projects, because we are not going to support the Northern Border only with internal and external security actions, with military and police security actions; We are going to support the Northern Border, too, with economic development.

Initiatives of the Borders of Peace and Production

During the regional forums, particularly in the province of Sucumbíos, a visit was made to the Northern Border area, with the foreign press, to a cocoa production project.

The Cocoa Yes, Coca No Program was launched there. This project currently involves a network of 2,500 producers, already has drying areas, sells cocoa to three companies: a German one, Kraf, and two national companies that are exporting chocolate; they are not exporting cocoa; 2,500 families that have an economic income have incorporated an added value to their production process. We are expanding this project: the goal is to expand the production chain to 20,000 producers. For this we are legalizing the lands of people who have lived there for 30, 50, 100 years and do not have property titles so that they can access credit, in other cases they have already accessed credit from the National Development Bank and the National Financial Corporation, because we want to have a successful productive chain there.

We also created a coffee production chain with three leading companies: Galeti, Vélez and INTA, coffee companies that are already marketing coffee in the national and international markets.

Last year, one of them, Galeti, won the award for best coffee in 2007. We can proudly say that this production chain now involves 2,200 peasant coffee producers and three companies; we want to expand high-quality coffee.

We also established the same experience in Carchi, with the dairy production chain and we have companies, specifically one, exporting already to Europe 100 varieties of cheeses. With this we have 380 peasant families that produce milk.

All producers and all companies, with social responsibility, pay their taxes. In the case of cocoa and coffee, the price paid to the producer is 20% higher than the market price, because the quality that we have achieved with this coffee and this cocoa obtains a higher surplus, the industrial one.

These initiatives are a clear example of what the solidarity and associative economy of the society of producers and owners is, promoted by the current Government of the Citizen Revolution. The experience of the production chains is successful and we must multiply them. We do not want to have only these three products, we also want to advance with fishing projects in Esmeraldas; tourism and handicrafts in Imbabura, Carchi, Sucumbíos, Orellana and Esmeraldas, textiles in Antonio Ante and leather products in Cotacachi, etc. We want the northern part of the country to be a zone of economic development and, therefore, shielded from drug trafficking, drug cultivation, organized crime and any form of violence.

The Internal and External Security Agenda of Ecuador must be an instrument for peace, full respect for human rights and the development of our country. The proposal of this security agenda opens a new constructive process of the evolution of internal and external security doctrine and systems with a focus on sovereignty, democracy and human rights.

III. Towards a new State policy of Internal and External Security

3.1. necessary differentiations

Before getting involved in the analysis of security management in Latin America, it is necessary to raise some theoretical details about security. In the first place, it is pertinent to locate ourselves at the genesis of the modern State to understand the importance that the concept of security had as the articulating and legitimizing axis of the existence of the State as a political organization classically reflected in two spheres of incidence, the internal and the external. . In this sense, from the very dawn of modern political thought, the primary purpose of States, as political units, was to provide and normatively guarantee security both from attack threats from enemy States (external security) and from the public order and the peaceful coexistence of its inhabitants in a certain territory (internal security).

3.1.1 External security

On the side of external security, two theories have dominated the classic debate on the international relations of states: these are realism and liberalism.

3.1.1.1 Realism

Realism was one of the pioneering doctrines of thought in the field of study of relations between States. The central interest of this theory

The key was in the understanding of power as the articulating axis of the international dynamics of States, since only through this element (power) could the position and preservation of the national interest within an international system be preserved. Thus the protection of the state through the use of warfare was justified by the constant threat of dominance and the foreign invader. For this current, States (units) were politically arranged static elements that differed from the mobile units characteristic of medieval societies.

This thought inspired the subsequent development of neorealist theories of international relations at the global level.

In the realistic vision of the State, one of the most important aspects was the issue of war. For Sun-Tzu, Machiavelli, Clausewitz, who at different times dared to think about this aspect, war came to be a mechanism for the extension of political practices in international relations, and also the inalienable power of the prince or ruler to dictate their decision to go to war or not.¹ One could also observe the power of rulers to use war as a mechanism of deterrence and control (called preventive war) to guarantee internal peace and the survival of a nation.²

² War is a matter of vital importance for nations, it is the trance where the life and death of a country is decided, the path that marks its survival and its ruin; not only as a practical justification, but above all a moral justification. The ideal is to preserve the country itself and leave as a second option, annihilate the enemy. Sun Tzu goes further and states that winning a hundred battles is not optimal; The optimal thing will be to dominate the enemy without having killed a single soldier. The war for state survival is seen as the last resort. (bows, obcit)

What justified the war as survival of the State was counteracted with far-reaching warmongering campaigns such as preventive war, the same one that was carried out in pursuit of internal security. So prevention and attack, defense and offense, were strategic decisions that obeyed reasons of state. In this sense, there was no empire without conquest and there was no conquest without a fundamental reason of State.

From here was sustained the imperial nature of modern states.

For Machiavelli, on the other hand, the possibility of using war was among the virtues of the prince whose main objective was to establish power and the conservation of the State. A bad government was not replaced by a good government as the classical Greco-Roman political thought conceived it; On the contrary, in this context, a bad government was a sign of weakness that, according to Machiavelli, would be quickly absorbed by a stronger State that would use its war machine to achieve it. As can be seen in these authors, war was a category from which the emergence of the nation state could be thought of. Implicit in it was a basic security criterion where the possibility of achieving peace was closely linked to the issue of war, that is, peace was a matter of international power relations, a great military machine to achieve it and the nature empire of nations

3.1.1.2 Idealism

On the other hand, there were positions contrary to this expansive and warlike nature of the States. Among these positions, the idealist or liberal position of conceiving relations between States is mainly rescued. Without However, it is worth noting that both realism and idealism were attached to a common set of principles, the same one that recognized the existence of separate and powerful states. The difference from idealism lay in explaining the ways in which these states maintained contact with one another. The most classic expression of liberal or idealistic political thought in international relations is based on Kant with his book on perpetual peace. This book argues in general terms that although the war served as a mechanism of differentiation and establishment of nations at first, this practice as the States were consolidated was no longer necessary; the same one that needed to be supplanted by a system of moral norms or categorical imperatives capable of assuring an international legal order whose objective is economic progress, cooperation and the integration of states. This thus constituted the pillars for what was later called institutional neoliberalism in the Study of International Relations.

Now, it seems that the idealist position was not interested in the issue of security linked to the use of violence and war as a fundamental aspect of the external relations of States, since the greater State interdependence, the greater peace and harmony between states. Liberal thought ultimately appealed to the establishment of a solid state institutionalism and the idealistic correspondence that the security of individuals is world security through cooperation. Behind this idea was a positive, peaceful and utopian nature of the states, which focused their purposes on the idea of development and economic progress. World peace was the responsibility of the cooperation of States, a relational matter of construction and not of exclusion and domination between them, where war was impossible in an interdependent world.³

³ Grocio's position could be located in the middle of these two positions as another source of reflection on security. According to this author, the Grecian tradition would be another source of reflection on security; the same one that at first is located closer to the Kantian position by not assuming the state of anarchy as a given matter, but accepts that the states are the largest actors in the international system. These are arranged according to a series of norms and behaviors of the societies that each State forms. However, for reasons of exposition, I have conceived realism and liberalism as the two sources of thought that have influenced the classical conception of external security. Orozco, Gabriel, 2006, "The Concept of Security in the Theory of International Relations" in CIDOB Magazine D`AFERS INTERNACIONALS 72, Institute for international cooperation for quality development, www.cidob.org

According to the external vision, the security of the state or the national one was the logical continuation of the security of the individuals. However, that was far from happening in reality. From the very beginning, questions of internal security occupied the center of the tasks of the States, always covering two aspects: the protection of citizens by the State, and the protection of citizens against the State.

In addition to this thought, at the end of the 19th century the need to think about ensuring the conditions for the safety of citizens also entered the debate. In any case, internal security in its entirety could be described with the modern term of the function of the state.

In this sense, the theoretical models that are the pillars where the internal security discourse can be located are: public security and the security of individuals at first and social security later.

3.1.2.1 Public safety

In the case of public security, the first great thinker of this position was Thomas Hobbes, who saw the need to impose public order based on its preponderance of the intervention of the great State (Leviathan) in the face of a negative vision and distrust of the individual.⁴ This figure of ⁴ Although Hobbes is also credited with inspiring the development of realist theories of international relations because he places security as one of the causes of the creation of the modern State, and an alternative to the anarchy of the society, in this work we will assume the contribution of Hobbes as fundamental to understand internal security. In any case, for Hobbes the presence of the modern State was to ensure the coexistence of the inhabitants; while at the external level he saw the creation of a supranational authority to regulate the international agenda as impossible (Orozco, obcit).

The great State had as its main objective the preservation of the integrity of its citizens and rid the world of anarchic nature, the state of nature.

This State guarantor of security has caused a philosophical and political commotion up to the present, since with this appears a distributive policy of a State that intervenes for the peace of its inhabitants. The security of individuals depended on the stability and power of the great State and its legitimacy to apply the use of force to achieve peace and social order. In this way the State was prior to the society of individuals.

individuals, politics and security.

3.1.2.2 Individual security

On the individual security side, we have the model of John Locke, who criticized Hobbes' thought as harmful to individual or citizen security, since it did not establish clear limits where the civil rights of the person begin with respect to the State. Locke's thought saw that the essence of achieving peace and security in society was the creation of a contract. For this author, the social contract was the basis of political power where it was based on the consensus of free men within a society. Locke was in favor of establishing the theory of popular sovereignty opposing it to the absolutist of Hobbes. For this it was necessary to establish fixed and impartial laws that could resolve disputes between individuals and limit the mandate of the rulers and frame them within the framework of the law. Therefore the individual was prior to society; and the state became a hinge that released individuals with a peaceful nature from the insecurities of war.

This liberal State proposed by Locke privileged individual liberties through the exercise of civil rights. Hobbes's model, for its part, gave preference to an interventionist State but without visibly establishing the limits. Currently, intervention models are clearly legally delimited giving way to the Social States of Rights. On this Rule of Law rests the capacity real and practical coercive power of the State that executes these tasks through the police and the penal system. During the absolute state, the police appeared fundamentally as a repressive and confidential arm of the sovereign power. With the rule of law, the police acquired a more transparent and open character, with the capacity to be subjected to popular control; however, the possibility of moving towards an authoritarian path or towards a democratic path is always open, since ultimately the problem does not lie in where power rests; but in who exercised that power.

3.1.2.3 The welfare state: social security, the pillar of public safety.

The contradictions of the capitalist system between owners and non-owners produced great tensions and contradictions to the social contract of the liberal guardian state that in practice it was impossible to resolve within the rationality of the market, which originated a series of dysfunctions in the capitalist system. . Thus, the State had to abandon its role as guardian to intervene in its regulation.

This interventionist spirit tried to establish exceptional and special regimes where one could no longer start from the idea of original equality between men. It was necessary to start from a material philosophical foundation of social inequality in terms of the distribution of goods and social position; which generated conflict, disorders and sources of social insecurity. In this sense, the responsibility for social insecurity no longer lay with the individual but with society and structural inequalities; For this reason, poverty begins to be seen as the germ where transgressive cultures settle and what is sought is to reduce these social risks through social intervention programs that seek to eradicate these social imbalances. Therefore, the notion of security no longer lies exclusively in the role of the liberal guardian and police state, (it ceases to have force as a repressive entity and guarantor of public security) but rather in a more organic and supportive conception of security. society. With these pacification measures politically undertaken in

Approaches to the concept of security from the classical thought of the Modern State

Level	Theory	Analysis unit	object of study	Means to achieve it	purpose
External	Realism	State	Can	Military power	Security and national interest
External	Idealism	State	Peace	Cooperation for economic development	interstate cooperation
Internal	Security public	State	absolute state (Leviathan)	Social pact	Protection of citizens by the State
Internal	individual security	State	Rights civilians	Social contract	Citizen protection against the State
Internal	Security Social	State	Inequality Social	social consensus	Eliminate exclusion or social differences

Intelligently, the term risk covered much more than technological aspects, it also included social and economic dimensions of society. The most common management of contingency is insurance where the interventionist state becomes a security/insurance state. From this, risk can be understood as a specific technique for managing insecurities.

This model found its limit or limit when, at a social level, this social differentiation due to the intervention generated strong social stigmas that hindered the legitimacy of said interventions, and at an accumulation level when the acceleration of the process prevented the financing of social spending and a growing consumption of energy. and natural resources. For this reason, the welfare state that tried to seek social security with levels of control and social intervention ended up exacerbating threats or dangers that constitute other types of social risks (ecological, financial, cultural, etc.).

3.1.3 Security, a concept under construction

When outlining the challenge of making a precise and articulated definition around the concept of security⁵ none of these points of view seems to be useful when wanting to have a normative and ontological understanding of the term.⁶ This lack of precision from the classical vision does not go due to the limitations or lack of clarity in the definition of the concept itself; Rather, this may be due to the serious and contradictory problems in the application of the concept in concrete reality. What is clear from this classical vision is that the fundamental unit for this thought was the modern State as a provider of security; however, the difference lies in the focus or accent where the attention or primary purpose is directed. In this sense, the great contradictions of the concept of security leads us to consider the need to conceive the term security articulated and related to the social and political contexts where it operates; which gives it a status of historical and dynamic concept.

This ambiguous characteristic that gives a historical sense to the concept of security is presented as a useful element when addressing phenomena as complex as globalization. Security in a context like the current one is far from being an isolated phenomenon or reducible to a single dimension. Safety at a practical level is at the center of an intense and constant activity to address both the scope of undesired side effects resulting from human interventions in various fields; as the spaces where decisions are defined or made around this complex issue (traditionally linked to exclusive military management); and the models of execution and citizen participation.

⁵ The concept "security" comes from the Latin securitas, which in turn derives from the adjective securus, which is composed of se, which means without, and cure, which means care. given or concern. Therefore we can define that the concept of security etymologically speaking means without fear, carefree or without fear of worrying. Martinez, Alejandro, 2001, What is National Security, www.tuobra.unam.mx/publicadas.

⁶ There are authors who place security at a normative level: they maintain that security is a basic need of the human being referred to the absence of threats; that is, security is an end in itself that becomes an inalienable and fundamental human right. Bodemer, Klaus, 2002, Democracy and security in a globalized and risky world. Institute for Ibero-American Studies, unpublished working paper, Hamburg.

What has been said means assuming fundamental changes in the identification of new threats and/or protection units (environmental security, democratic security, legal security, economic security, citizen security, societal security, human security, etc.); understand the need to establish cooperative links with new forms or entities responsible for the security of societies such as supranational organizations, local actors, citizens, etc.; and to stop looking at the concept as a rearguard element and for the exclusive use of specialized agents to have a more participatory and proactive perspective of citizens in the design of policy and identification of threats.

For this, it is valid to start from a constructive vision of security where the State must stop seeing citizens as passive entities. Any security agenda in current terms must integrate a pluralistic position of social participation where individuals, communities or general collectivities can prioritize and establish their own security agendas within the framework of democracy, human rights and the sovereignty of the peoples. and citizens.

3.2. Latin America and its Security History

3.2.1 Latin America and Neorealist Theories

In this context, although the republican era in Latin America marked the progressive development of military, police, justice and prison institutions in the 19th century, thus constituting the characteristics and identity of each country (what we can talk about today is the fundamental pillar institutions of a comprehensive security system), talking about security in Latin America from a homogeneous regional perspective only made sense within the framework of its geopolitical position. and strategic in the framework of the Cold War.

In this scenario, the definitions of this historical period were marked by the political use that the United States gave to the concept of national security after World War II with the appearance of the Cold War. With the generalization of this type of political category, the military plane and the use of force became the pillar of the security of States and international relations. Thus, the State became the only competent unit for the defense of the territory; through legal monopoly of coercive power and the provision of material means to carry out this task. Only through the defense of the territorial integrity of the State, could the interests of the nation be preserved and with it the well-being of society. Therefore, when talking about security, there was no other way to think than in State Security.

This political use also generated, at an academic level, the conditions for the appearance of neorealist theories that ended up giving scientific validity to these arguments. Among its main expositors, Kenneth Waltz who clearly established the differences between domestic and foreign policy. According to this author, internal security was hierarchically ordered where institutions and agencies are presented in a relationship of supra and subordination with strong ties of interdependence and cooperation based on the social division of labor. In contrast, international systems were characterized by an absence of government (anarchy) in which any emerging element of authority was scarce and difficult to sustain. This conception, which today can be described as traditional, equated the security of the State with that of society, whose objective was to identify possible threats from abroad to provide security for the community, the nation, and society. Therefore the security

Internal responsibility was left to the internal and domestic tasks of each State outside of external strategies.

From a hegemonic vision, the international system is an anarchic order, absent of government, where the capacity of the strongest imposes its interests over other states. The latter conceived as units independent autonomous whose raison d'être is to survive to guarantee its existence. Being the prerequisite and justification necessary to guarantee its existence the use of military force in order to achieve a balance of powers between States.

Integration and cooperation, in this scenario, is conceived as a tool for weak States that tries to counteract their inability to present their interests against the agendas of powerful States. It means having vulnerabilities that mark their international behaviors that have an impact on their national internal interests, but not as a solidarity desire to guarantee their peoples a more dignified, more equitable and just life.

3.2.2 The cold war

However, in the case of Latin America, this approach manifested itself in the effort to implement regional cooperation instruments marked by military strategies in exchange for some hegemonic offer of economic and social development.

Thus, the international policy of the United States after World War II and during the Cold War was based mainly on regional cooperation systems such as the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance, TIAR, whose purpose was to establish a continental security system against the possibility of external invasions (argument for the resolution of the Rio de Janeiro Protocol). Invasions that were understood as communist threats or regional border conflicts, in conjunction with the Monroe Doctrine of "America for the Americans"

This had a notable influence, within the framework of the Cold War, on the design of the regional and national security strategy through international policies called hemispheric security, among which the following stood out: Inter-American Defense Board; Military Assistance Program; Schools of the Americas and Navy; Agency for International Development (AID) and joint military operations⁷; in addition to the intentional plan of Latin America as an Alliance for Progress and support for de facto governments in several countries with the aim of stopping the onslaught of communism in the world and that threatened hemispheric security.

In Latin America, the National Security policies in their internal dimension took the name of the National Security Doctrine.

This was perhaps the only theoretical attempt in Latin America capable of explaining the characteristics of the new militarism that emerged in the 1970s and which was characterized by the occupation of state institutions by the military.⁸ This period was characterized in the first place by to articulate the nationalist and paternalistic spirit of the old militarism, the US influence in the cold war, and at an internal level the efforts of governments to counteract insurgent movements influenced by the logic of the Cuban revolution and Ernesto Guevara.

The ideal model of this doctrine in South America appeared in Argentina and Brazil and with some variants in Chile, Peru and Ecuador with more development tendencies. The military were seen as progressives, ⁷ South American Commission, 1987, Democratic and Regional Security, Report Zone of Peace, Argentina.

⁸ This theoretical approach has 4 stages that facilitate its understanding, these are: 1) The old militarism, 2) the growing political-military influence of the United States in Latin America after the Second World War, 3) the fight against insurgent movements Marxists inspired by the Cuban revolution and pretext for the raison d'être of the new Latin American militia, 4) the decline of this doctrine that began with the policies of President Carter and a change of conception in US policy. Leal B, Francisco, 2002, National Security adrift: From the National Front to the Post-Cold War, Alfaomega grupo editor SA, Mexico.

incorruptible, founders and heirs of the national identity and saviors of the nation. This allowed them to have an institutional ideology in their capacity as rulers that is characterized by authoritarianism and often totalitarianism, as in the southern cone, which arrogated self-attributions of popular representation, denying political dialogue and any form of popular participation. They had a mechanical and simple vision of society based on moralism and the revaluation of the past. All individuals who did not accept this mission were considered political enemies of the nation and those who accepted subordination were considered friends.

This type of regimes were characterized by the subordination of the rationality of accumulation to the reproduction of social privileges and the strengthening of political power. The idea of democracy was biased, since the fact was applied in justification of the right; which led to systematic violations of human rights and basic freedoms in the name of democracy and the defense of institutions and the constitution.

3.2.3 Period of Democracy and Neoliberalism

By the end of the 1970s, Latin America ceased to have the importance of a strategic region in military terms that it had during the Cold War. Due to various factors, including: a highly technical and mobile warfare capacity⁹ on the part of the United States, the recession of the US economy after the oil crisis, complaints about human rights violations resulting from dictatorships in Latin American countries especially in the southern cone, which had been favored by US international policy decades before.

For the decade of the eighties, the Government of the United States proposes a new regional agenda derived from the Washington Consensus reorienting

Taking the issue of military security in the face of the communist threat to the inclusion of economic, social and humanitarian issues. All this within a context of a Latin America trapped by a debt that forced it to paralyze its social investment in the face of the obligations that its governments maintained with international banks, acute inflationary processes and the weakening of the State structure as a strengthener of the markets. internal.

The new scenario of this security was understood for the region as democratic governments, structural and cultural changes in the management and administration models of public affairs, the freedom of markets and a neoliberal economic policy, and the appearance of new threats that they threaten the quality of life of citizens and the stability of democracies. The latter being drug trafficking, terrorism, crime and the environment.

The democratization process “called the third wave of democratization” caused the international policy of the United States towards Latin America to have a different character than in past decades. War was seen as an obsolete form of conflict resolution and this marked a change in the levels of negotiation and the international perspective.

The growth of underdevelopment and economic deterioration also marked a new approach to intervention, where strategies of shared security interests were privileged, which favored the demilitarization of governments in Latin America. International interventions should be made within the framework of respect for democracy and human rights that partly amend the traumatic experiences of military dictatorships inspired by the Doctrine of National Security in Latin America.¹⁰

¹⁰ Process similar to the transition model of post-Franco Spain.

On the other hand, the entry into force of the cultural and structural changes resulting from globalization and the influence of the policies of the Washington Consensus brought with them significant changes at the Latin American level and especially in Latin America in what has to do with their State models and political management. As a result of this, during the 1980s and 1990s in Latin America there was a significant growth in the social and political role of both private agents and corporations, transnationals, companies, and non-governmental organizations; as well as social organizations and state institutions of local and sectional representation that break with the hierarchical system of internal public security typical of the National Security model.

Lastly, with the fall of the Berlin Wall, the existence of a new US hegemony regarding the definition of new threats that threaten the Security of this country such as: international organized crime, terrorism, drug trafficking, environmental threats, among many more. In the midst of this topic, a discussion also begins about the relationship between economic, social, political, military, human rights, ecological aspects and the security of people; the same as the imbrication between dialogue, cooperation, conflict prevention and security of the parties.

These conditions generated that during the 90s and 80s the Security Policy in Latin America is divided in the face of two clearly defined processes:

1. The need to establish a new look at security through the proposal of reforms to the institutional framework of the public force and justice, discredited in many cases due to the influence of the National Security Doctrine decades ago;
2. The hegemonic influence of the new national security agendas (drug trafficking, migration, terrorism, organized crime) promoted and imposed by US foreign policy on Latin American countries.

3.2.4 The new security issues: Justice and military and police reforms

In the 1990s, the need to establish profound reforms to the repressive apparatuses (police and armed forces) and justice was raised with the aim of catching up with the influence of the processes of democratization, modernization and transformation of the States. from the 80s and 90s. This need was created with the desire at first to get in tune with the new concepts of security crossed by the criteria of democratization, transparency and respect for human rights as a way to overcome past experiences and later be more effective and precise. to face the new social threats that threaten the security of citizens.

Despite this general claim, great were the drawbacks encountered. Rather, the nuance that has marked the reform processes of security and justice institutions in Latin America has been influenced by the restrictions produced by traditionalist corporate interests inside and outside the institutions, many of them still aligned with the legacy of the National Security Doctrine. In this sense, because security and justice institutions are highly corporate, with false esprit de corps and with an almost natural propensity to restrict large-scale structural changes, reformist experiences throughout the entire region have been limited in terms of their application in their real dimension.

An example of this is that it is very common in the reformist language of Latin American police and military institutions to speak of counter-forms, which is nothing more than an institutional strategy and that of conservative groups to confront and counteract the reformist proposals initiated in an institution. . On the other hand, the influence of the National Security Doctrine can not only be evidenced in military and police organizational models; which are characterized, in most cases, for being highly corporate, hierarchical and reluctant institutions.

civil controls and influences; but also in the type of look or response culturally imposed to see security problems. For example, the scandals denouncing police brutality and human rights violations in Brazil, Central America, and Venezuela have been serious, demonstrating the repressive influence of the National Security Doctrine in force to this day.

3.2.4.1 Military reforms

Despite these general characteristics, various reform experiences have been initiated in the region during this period. The Armed Forces, for example, were especially analyzed in the 1990s in Central America and the Southern Cone, where they played very active roles during civil wars and dictatorships. During the late 1990s and 2000s, the vast majority of countries have introduced White Papers as part of their institutional policy where the new look at defense policy is defined, thus defining institutional agendas and priorities.

The white papers are instruments that allow countries to explain their points of view, objectives and policies in relation to defense, motivate the participation of civil society and contribute to strengthening democratic practices. This is intended to create awareness and citizen commitment regarding the importance of the issue of defense in the destinations of each country.

Likewise, there has been experience of reforms to the defense sector in countries of Central America and the Southern Cone, but without positive advances in other countries of the region.

3.2.4.2 Police reforms

Similarly, experiences with police reform have been varied; although in its practical application there were contradictory elements that ¹¹ The intelligence sector, for its part, advances are much less evident and in many cases a reform process has not yet begun. (Report on the Security Sector in Latin America and the Caribbean, 2007).

it distances them considerably from the spirit or purpose of the same.¹² Police institutions were the center of important changes in several Latin American countries in the 90s, such as those generated after the signing of the Central American peace treaties. In general terms, we can say that progress in this matter has also been uneven in thematic and territorial terms. Thus, three clearly defined processes can be evidenced: the creation of new police institutions in those countries that suffered civil wars such as the case of El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Haiti; partial reforms with the objective of establishing measures against corruption and police inefficiency as in the case of Colombia, Argentina and Peru; and initiatives for police modernization and implementation of community police as in the case of Chile and Brazil, among others.¹³

3.2.4.3 Judicial reforms

As regards the justice sector, the pace of reforms has been a little more accentuated. Despite the fact that the road was full of contradictions and setbacks that have generated great differences in the experience between one country and another, the need to establish reforms to replace the inquisitive system with the adversarial and oral system that guarantees due process, marked the Latin American agenda in the last two decades. In this context, reforms were evident in countries such as Argentina, ¹² These changes, it could be said, are still in their early stages and many of the changes have been reversed after a while. This makes it a bit complicated to analyze the reforms in their real dimension or impact; however, several important efforts have been made to assess and characterize this process at the country level and regionally. Frühling, Hugo, 2005, "Police reform and the democratization process", in Hugo Frühling and Joseph S. Tulchin, "editors", Crime and Violence in Latin America, Fondo de Cultura Económica, Colombia.

Guatemala, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Venezuela, Chile, Paraguay, Bolivia, Ecuador, Nicaragua, Honduras, the Dominican Republic and Colombia, Peru and Mexico (Vargas, 2008); all of them with the desire to adjust their justice apparatuses to the requirements of a democratic and agile and modern justice.

3.2.4.4 Prison systems

Within the criminal justice sector, another interesting element to analyze is the Latin American prison system; which has shown signs of a recurring crisis in recent decades. In this sense, the need to increase the punitive burden in the severity of the penalties due to the increase in crime and violence, caused the Latin American prison system to face problems of overcrowding, violation of human rights, among other things. . This brought as a result that Latin America began to generate policies aimed at the privatization of the system; which has been widely debated and questioned for going against the nature and purpose of social rehabilitation.

3.2.4.5 Private Security

Lastly, an aspect that is also interesting to analyze and that has rarely been incorporated into the debate on the reform of the security system is the privatization of security. In Latin America, all the countries have experienced exponential growth in this activity with little government control and regulation; which becomes one more threat to the security system of the respective countries.

3.2.4.6 Comprehensive reforms

As we can see, there are various reform experiences in the security and justice sector in Latin America; However, its scope is still very limited and little known in terms of true institutional democratization due to the influence of institutional culture.

tutional from the past and by corporate interests in the institutions. On the other hand, another of the most outstanding characteristics of this process is that it was thought from a sectoral scope and not from a comprehensive perspective. In this sense, the different reformist actions in Latin America have often been disjointed by sector and lacking a central planning that has given it the characteristics of being a fragmentary and disconnected process in terms of objectives and temporalities. For example, it is very common to find experiences of judicial reform in several countries without even having reconsidered reforms or modifications to the police and prison system.

In this context, if it is assumed that it is necessary to establish a multidimensional view of current security problems, it is not enough just to make partial sectoral modifications, but also to the integral system of the institutions that are part of and have responsibility for security management. from a democratic and sovereign perspective. ¹⁴ According to Minnaert (2007), a process of comprehensive reform of the country's security system is necessary in order for the citizen and the community to find more answers in accordance with their security needs.

Consequently, a reform to the security system includes entities such as: the police, the military and paramilitary forces, the intelligence services, penal institutions, and the Judiciary; as well as Congress and civil society organizations. This approach differs from traditional forms of military and police assistance in at least three ways: 1) that it meets standards of transparency, legality, and accountability; 2) the need to incorporate a holistic and comprehensive view of institutional reforms; 3) that intends to have a positive impact not only on the security of the State but also on the security of communities and individuals, guaranteeing a security service that is respectful of human rights and within the framework of the law and sovereignty of nations.

3.2.5 Hegemony and new threats

Another important element to analyze in Latin America is the factor of US regional National Security priorities and their influence on the security agendas in each country; which, has walked in parallel and in contradiction to the institutional reforms of the security sector in each Latin American country and especially the Andean Region. fifteen

Now, with the end of the Cold War throughout the world, the social and epistemological conditions were given for a reconsideration of the worn-out concept of National Security that had prevailed for nearly 50 years. In this context, the emergence of interdependent and cooperative theories opposed to structural neorealism augured well for the new international policy of the new order. In this way, economic progress and the "perpetual peace of nations" in the purest Kantian style was the unequaled condition for the progress of nations.

Regarding the issue of security, the loss of the enemy's referent was particularly exercised during the cold war and the bad memories and experiences in different places gave the possibility of the rise of new security concepts such as: democratic security, diplomatic security, security citizenship, human security, sustainable security, among others, marked the agenda of international cooperation in the 1990s throughout the world and especially in Latin America.¹⁶

15 Neild, Rachel, 2005, "United States Police Assistance and Drug Control Policies" in Drugs and Democracy in Latin America, Coletta A. Youngers and Eileen Rosin (eds), WOLA, Biblos Publishing, Washington DC

16 These conditions led to a decline in the use of the concept of National Security in Latin America during the 1990s and 1980s. During this time, according to Leal, in Latin America the main threat facing National Security was not knowing what those threats were. (Loyal, obcit). Post-Cold War security threats were characterized as complex social problems of a transnational order and not interstate threats. Many of the problems currently classified as security have little or nothing to do with military affairs, which causes problems for the raison d'être of current militarism, where there is a certain level of oversizing of its powers by ascribing social issues with military issues and the use of force.

Despite the fact that these concepts have very different contents and approaches that differentiate them from each other, their purpose was clearly marked by the conditions of the time, which consisted of looking alternately at the concept of security outside of military and territory exclusively. Among these common characteristics, it is possible to consider the multidimensional character, both spatial and temporal, of security and threats, both in their causes and in their level of response, the need for interstate and intersectoral cooperation to resolve them, and the questioning of the concept of sovereignty as they are considered offensive and not very useful for the development of new security concep

In the 1990s and early 2000s, two events marked the end of the Kantian utopia of "perpetual peace" in Latin America proposed by certain intellectuals after the end of the Cold War: the US anti-narcotics policy and the attack on the September 11, 2001. In the first case, although the US anti-drug initiative was proposed decades ago (1982) by President Reagan, the incubation process of the US strategy to fight drugs took more or less 16 years to acquire the profile it currently shows. In the second case, the attacks of September 11 put a new turn in US policy on the debate scene by prioritizing international terrorism and its consequent instigators, such as illegal migration, among its main threats to the security of the country. and organized crime.

In this context, the rise of these new threats became the central argument of the US military discourse on national security; which gave a fundamental turn to international policy towards Latin America and the world. In Latin America, the centrality of this dis course was basically framed in the structural changes of the system and the so-called "existential crisis" of the institutions of the Treasury in Latin America.¹⁷

17 (Loyal, obcit).

As we saw previously, several countries gradually incorporated White Papers on National Defense, which sought to turn and reconsider defense towards the new threats that threaten the institutional stability of the countries. In this way, this US hegemony was configuring a programmatic agenda that consists of three points: militarization, criminalization and cooperation.

As a first point and opposed to the multidimensional dimension of the causes and the levels of institutional responsibility for these new threats, the North American agenda proposed or prioritized a military response to this type of problem. Because they are part of a national security policy, these new threats should be considered threats against the national security of the respective countries. On the other hand, this characteristic raised a close collaboration between military and police forces that made it very difficult to separate the limits between the powers of these two people. Thus, while some speak of a militarization of police responses to problems of public order and security, others speak of the policing of military tasks, traditionally engaged in defending the external security of countries. The truth is that, as we can see in graph 1, the levels of cooperation or aid from the United States demonstrate the priorities of the type of response that has been given to the new threats to its National Security.

Thus, while military/police aid did not exceed 35% of the total amount, by the year 2000 this share grew to 51.6%. However, the average for the 2000s was 45% participation in each year. This demonstrates the importance that the United States has given to military/police cooperation as a solution to its National Security problems.

On the other hand, another particular characteristic of this type of policy is the criminalization of these types of crimes that are characterized by seeking a tougher punitive sentence that penalizes these new threats. Thus, in different countries legal reforms regarding increase the criminal charges and the effectiveness of the judicial system in dealing with criminal proceedings related to this activity. In this context, large amounts of money have been invested by the United States in the search to improve the efficiency and professionalism of police, military, and judicial agents; which has marched parallel to or above the priorities aimed at establishing more comprehensive or general long-term institutional reforms.

Finally, this type of policy, supported by the concepts of cooperation, international interdependence and questioning of the sovereignties of nations, placed Latin America in the position it has historically occupied within the framework of Hemispheric Security policies in the context of the War Cold sheltered under the new paradigm of Regional Security. In this sense, the influence of what Núñez (2004)¹⁸ calls destatizes sentencing (where States no longer have sovereignty in defining their criminal policy); the presence of military bases in foreign countries; and the legitimization of attack or arbitrary invasion of foreign territories justified under the logic of legitimate defense and preventive war; among other things more; they make it very difficult to propose a legitimate security policy in accordance with the principles of security, sovereignty and democracy.

Now, if we add to this the fragmentation and institutional weakness in the security sector reform processes evidenced in many Latin American countries during these two decades, we have a breeding ground for the presence of a new era of North American hegemony and the imposition once again of the neorealist doctrines in the definition of the security of the countries.

However, in recent years in Latin America, lights of hope have begun to be seen regarding the possibility of establishing agreements and commitments of cooperation and comprehensiveness between States of the region, which alternatively respond to the hegemonic agendas established in the agreements of hemispheric security of bygone eras. Among these alternatives we have the creation of the Union of South American Nations (UNA SUR), the Andean Community of Nations (CAN) and the South American Defense Council. Thus, with this, the possibility of establishing a coordination and co-responsibility mechanism between Latin American countries that respects the diversity of peoples, national processes, human rights, democracy is opened; but on the other hand, to unite efforts to fight poverty, inequality, education and many pending issues.

Only in this way can we look at the integrality of the concept of security; that is to say, a security thought in the territories of peace, the sovereignty of the peoples, human dignity and development.

IV. Security in Ecuador

4.1 Brief history of the Security Doctrine in Ecuador

4.1.1 Armed Forces

The history of the Ecuadorian Armed Forces in the republican era partly differed from the old Latin American militarism model, whose history dates back to the first half of the 19th century and reached its influence until the middle of the 20th century. This model, marked by Iberian and European influence, was characterized at the Latin American level with the creation of republics with incipient and unstable state structures and with little development of civil and civic values. This made the military always present itself as an institution of strong and dynamic integrators of national unity and identity.

In Ecuador, on the contrary, it is very complex to talk about the Ecuadorian Army as a continuous, stable and permanent institution throughout history. On the contrary, the same history shows us a successive list of temporal armies that existed as long as they were capable of restrain and control the enemy political and social forces and that after being defeated ended up establishing a new military force with different characteristics and social structure and with fidelity and submission to political power.

However, the army, as the first republican institution, became almost naturally the supreme arbiter of political disputes between regional oligarchies, claiming for itself a guardianship role regarding public life.¹⁹

In the first years of the republican life, the army recruited people from marginalized sectors who had participated in the independence struggle; the same thing that meant a good possibility of social ascent and the only social space with a republican mentality, unlike the whole of society where the ideas and values of the old civil society continued to prevail.

This republican vocation of the initial republican army was recovered with the Marcista revolution led by José María Urbina that led it to confront the oligarchic alliance of foreign soldiers and Creole landowners headed by Juan José Flores. During the Garciano period, a process of restructuring the Armed Forces was undertaken with the aim of having greater control over the progressive and anti-oligarchic tendencies of the army. Thus, thanks to the introduction of chiefs and officers from the upper classes, it was intended to cleanse the rest of the old army of liberal ideology; which ended up weakening it against foreign forces. After García Moreno's stage, the armed forces were once again restructured, incorporating Liberal troops and officers. With this, the army resumed its old arbitration role, albeit in an attenuated form.

With the liberal revolution, a new National Army was created, organized on the basis of triumphant montonera troops, mostly from the coast. The former revolutionary leaders thus became part of the General Staff of the new Liberal Army, which General Eloy Alfaro sought to professionalize through the creation of military schools and academies and with the advice of foreign military missions.

The Julian revolution of 1925 is another of the historical moments of the military institution where the progressive spirit of the institution was revealed. This revolution, inspired and executed by young officers, with the purpose of changing the outdated social system of the country, had a broadly progressive character that fought against the economic power of the coastal plutocracy in favor of a more equitable and anti-oligarchic model.

In 1926 the revolution managed to consolidate itself as a simple modernizing movement of the Ecuadorian State. Public revenues were centralized, the Central Bank and the Superintendency of Banks were created. The principle of the social function of property and the representation of political minorities was established in the Assembly, habeas corpus and rights for "illegitimate" children were established. The Pension Fund for public employees, labor legislation on contracts, maximum hours, eviction, work for women and minors, and Labor Inspectorates were created.

At the military level, reforms were introduced to the organic military law, among which the increase to seven military zones stands out, which operationally divided the Ecuadorian territory.

4.1.2 National Police

To take a look at the origins of the National Police in Ecuador, it is necessary to go back to the foundations of the Republican era. In this period, the inheritance of the colonial administration model generated that the first police forces have a strong dependence and relationship with the local councils. The police fulfilled functions of public order such as the control of problems of decoration and hygiene typical of each city.

By the middle of the 19th century, these police forces functionally depended on the local authorities; which were regulated or rendered accounts in some way to the Ministry of the Interior of Ecuador.

The Ecuadorian National Police acquired a stronger institutionalization when it was defined for the first time as a State institution in 1884 by President José María Plácido Caamaño under the Ministry of Government and Foreign Relations (previously called the Ministry of the Interior). The "Order and Security Police", as this institution was initially called, was initially idealized as a civil force; however, his organization was militarized in order to put an end to the political and social conflicts of that time. In this sense, a unitary police force was needed at that time to establish the consolidation of the fragile Ecuadorian State. In 1892, the structure of the police was demilitarized by President Luís Cordero Crespo (1892-1895), but it was not until the 1920s that the first steps were taken to make it professional. In 1923, the police received the name of "National Police" and, in 1925, with the support of a French mission²⁰, the first police schools were created in Quito and Guayaquil.

The most important changes for the professionalization of the police occurred in 1938 with President Alberto Enríquez Gallo, who was considered the founder of the police as a public institution. In that year, the police changed its name twice: the first called "Police Forces", and a few months later it was called "Cuerpo de Carabineros". The institution received a new structure and military hierarchy, consolidating itself as a hybrid between police force and military force.²¹ During the government ²⁰ Here the influence of the French (continental European) police model in the conformation of the Ecuadorian Police is evident.

²¹ In fact, the first law on police personnel was entitled "Law on the Military Status and Promotions of the Police Forces" (1938). Also in that year the Carabineros Military School was created. Likewise, the first commanders and instructors of the National Police were career soldiers.

Under President Arroyo de Río (1940-1944), a greater militarization of the police was generated, a strategy that sought to protect this government from political pressure from the military, after the war against Peru and the signing of the Protocol of Río in 1942. In 1944, with the fall of the government of Arroyo de Río, caused by a military-popular insurrection, the police underwent another name change. In an attempt to reduce its military nature, it was renamed the "National Civil Guard". In 1946, for the first time, the police were introduced into the Constitution and referred to as civil police.

The National Congress, in 1951, again gave it the name of "National Police". On June 18, 1956, the Ministry of Government was defined for the first time as "Ministry of Government, Worship and Police" (a name that lasts to this day) and was authorized through Official Gazette 1201 of July 18, 1956. , create the Police Social Service Department. On the other hand, the police changed their names a couple more times. In 1973, President General Guillermo Rodríguez Lara named the police institution "National Civil Police" and in 1975 the same president changed the name again to "National Police". However, despite all these nominal changes, its organizational, hierarchical, disciplinary and doctrinal structure continued to be of a military type and organically dependent on the Ministry of Government.

4.2 The Doctrine of National Security and the dictatorships in Ecuador: the 60s and 70s

In Ecuador, the National Security Doctrine was the dominant security concept for much of the 1960s and 1970s. However, despite the fact that the National Security Doctrine was one of the largest efforts to militarize the concept of security, which had significant impacts on the security policies of the different Latin American countries during the cold war period; this model

It was incorporated in Ecuador with its respective specificities during the military dictatorships of these years.

These specificities have to do, first, with the levels of importance of the situation in Ecuador in the framework of the Cold War, in which the country did not occupy a preponderant or fundamental military and political geostrategic position for the United States. This allowed Ecuador to keep some autonomy in the decisions for the design of National Security policies. Secondly, and as a complement to the above, this period was characterized by the characteristics of the Armed Forces in the history of Ecuador. In this way, the Armed Forces historically gave an important emphasis both to aspects related to the defense of the territory and to the support of the economic and social development of the country under a highly nationalist and anti-imperialist scheme. Added to this project in the sixties was the reinterpretation made by the military of the old theories derived from the modernization school.²² From this formula resulted a military body that was assumed to be the bearer of a modern project in a backward and lagging population, facing the demands of progress.²³ This military vision and identity was reinforced with the importance that territorial defense tasks acquired within the framework of the border history with Peru; which outlined the reference of Ecuadorian foreign and military policy throughout the 20th century.

In the case of the National Police, although submission to logic and military preparation was evident long ago, the National Security Doctrine generated great distortions and institutional differences that were expressed in budgets, human resources, and institutional development. The National Police thus became an institution attached to the Force ²² Proof of this has been the agrarian reforms initiated in the military dictatorships of the 60s and 70s, the nationalization of oil in the 70s.

Public, relegated and neglected by the governments on duty; and on the other hand, influenced by the agendas and military formation of the National Security Doctrine based on the anti-communist struggle that sought the annihilation of the communist or revolutionary enemy. However, this military preponderance in the management of internal security, unlike other Latin American experiences, serious violations of human rights and police brutality by law enforcement institutions in this period were not reported in this period (except in cases such as the case of the Aztra sugar mill).²⁴

4.3 The return to democracy: the 1980s

At the end of the 1970s, Ecuador began a new democratic era in its republican stage that sought to give the State a renewed and modern political and administrative structure. However, in terms of security, the democratic transition process at the end of the decade did not make great progress. This was reflected in the 1978 Constitution where it was defined that the primary purpose of the Public Force (call it military or police) was to safeguard the conservation of national sovereignty, the defense and integrity and independence of the State and the guarantee of legal order. Therefore, preponderance was still given to a military vision of security aimed primarily at the defense of the territory and the institution. purpose of the State.²⁵

²⁴ Indeed, if we make a general evaluation of the evaluation of police work throughout history, it could be said roughly that the issue of violence and brutality, unlike other countries, has not been one of the fundamental concerns of the governmental spheres and of the military and police institutions during the republican period.

²⁵ Article 170 of the Political Constitution of Ecuador of 1978 stated that the National Police's fundamental mission was to guarantee internal order and individual and social security and would constitute an auxiliary force to the armed forces.

In 1981 the war conflict developed in the Cordillera del Cóndor between Ecuador and Peru caused the military and territorial defense to continue to dominate the priorities and security agendas of the governments in power throughout this decade. If we add to these that during the 1980s the tensions stemming from the cold war continued, the possibility of considering new approaches or looks at security more in line with democratic principles were scarce.

In this decade of transition to democracy in Ecuador, the Armed Forces also maintained a strong presence in the political, social and economic scene of the country as a result of its historical role and influence received by the institutional molding established in the dictatorship of General Rodríguez. Lara. In this sense, the new Constitution prioritized the role of the State in the economic and social spheres, accentuating the military presence and state dominance over areas considered strategic.²⁶ This type of institutional reform allowed the Ecuadorian Armed Forces to have a high political incidence. and maintain corporate relations with the State; which could be evidenced in the National Security Law of 1979 (in force until today). In contrast to this broad involvement in civil activities, the democratic participation of the Armed Forces and their contribution to the constitution of the citizenry it was limited by the sharp separation that was made at the same time of the civil and military world. In this way, the military, in order to fulfill their national functions, had to refrain from exercising their political rights.

cos with the return to democracy.

In the case of public security at the internal level, with the end of the dictatorships of the 70s and the return to democracy in 1979 in Ecuador fundamentals were not glimpsed in the institutional structure of the National Police. Thus, both with the Constitution of 1979, the National Police of Ecuador maintained its structure, organic dependency and military doctrine. This continued to be an institution organized under the hierarchical disciplinary system where the titles of officers, as well as the values that guide the institution, were military.

Added to this historical permanence of the military structure of the National Police, the 1980s were the scene of one of the most fundamental and negative aspects in the institutional life of the Ecuadorian National Police in its history. Thus, as a result of the influence of the National Security Doctrine, a strong anti-subversive policy was established as mechanisms for the control of public security during the democratic presidential period of León Febres Cordero (1984-1988). This period was when this type of Doctrine was most put into practice due to a strong repressive policy, based on the annihilation of the internal enemy and the lack of controls and institutional transparency, which consequently led to serious acts of police abuse such as the case of the Restrepo brothers in 1988.

In the late 1980s and early 1990s, the abuses carried out during the Febres Cordero period ended up establishing the abolition of the Criminal Investigation Services (SIC or better known as SIC 10).

This was intended to leave behind a time of institutional darkness that had not been a recurring practice of the institutions in charge of security in Ecuador. In this way, with the abolition of the SIC (maximum symbol of institutional repression in the period 84-88) gave way to the creation of the OID (Crime Investigation Office) in the Government of Rodrigo Borja.

4.4 1990s

Externally, during the 1990s, the military agenda once again occupied much of the attention of the respective governments due to the conflict latent border conflict with Peru. This became evident in the year 1995 when the Cenepa conflict was generated, the same ones that the expense of enormous economic resources meant to Ecuador; which had a negative impact on Public Finances a few years later. In this way, the military vision of Security remained in force for a large part of this decade to the detriment of other areas. Also during this period, the military; partly legitimized by a good historically built acceptance by the citizens who saw in them the calls to be the custodians of democracy; and in part also to the institutional faculties that allowed them to defend or care for the legal and constitutional order, had a strong presence as leaders of democracy during the political crises of 1996 and 2000.

Graph 2: Evolution of Homicides in Ecuador 1990-2007

Source: INEC. The data from 2000-2007 are based on the complaints of the Judicial Police of Ecuador.

On the other hand, during the 1990s, Ecuador, like some Latin American countries, began to experience a constant escalation in the rates of violence and crime. An example of this is that while in the 1980s homicides remained well below 10 homicides per hundred thousand inhabitants, in the 1990s this rose to a maximum of 14 at the end of the 1990s. In the mid-1990s, there was also a significant growth in the rate of complaints of crimes against property (crimes considered to have the greatest impact on the perception of citizen insecurity of the population), which exceeded 320 complaints per hundred thousand inhabitants in the year 1995 to 471.5 in the year 1999. (see graph 2). This became evident mainly in the large cities of the country where, adding to this exponential growth of certain types of common crimes, practices of crimes never seen before in Ecuador such as kidnapping for extortion began

This growth in crime rates led the National Police to begin developing outreach programs to the population in order to generate better protection services for it. This is how in 1991 the Immediate Assistance Posts (PAI) were created; which served as a prelude to what was later called Community Police. Likewise, in 1996 the creation of the Neighborhood Brigades (citizens' organizations promoted by the Police that carried out surveillance work in neighborhoods and communities); the same that in the opinion of Carlos Calahorrano²⁷ was a strategy to cover the deficit of police personnel that was mobilized to the southern border during those years. However, despite these actions as a result of the growth of criminal indicators, there were no changes, reforms or modernization plans in the police institution to face the problems of crime and corruption in the nineties.²⁸

However, despite the fact that reformist language was one of the themes most used by the governments of the day during the 1990s as a way out of the recurring social and political crises in the country, with the Political Constitution of 1998 in Ecuador, the structure of the security institutions practically remained intact in terms of its organization. In this sense, preponderance was due to the vision of National Security in charge of the military, there was no talk of human and citizen security and the Police were subsumed to the Armed forces in case of emergency and National Security.²⁹ However, At the level of the police institution, some legal and institutional conditions were established for the implementation of substantial changes within it. For example, the 1998 Constitution prescribed the establishment of the National Police Council and the prescriptive or constitutional power for the transition from the administration of police justice to the common judicial system (jurisdictional unit). However, in the first case, no legislation was passed in favor of the creation of an organic structure and, on the other hand, the National Congress did not establish guidelines or mechanisms for the implementation of this jurisdictional unit. In conclusion, these examples show how little importance was given to the issue of police safety during you this decade

In the 1990s, another of the problems that greatly affected the security of Ecuadorians was corruption in state spheres.

This crisis reached its climax when, as a result of a presidential decision, a bank holiday gave way, which generated one of the worst crises.

²⁹ Although there were editorial changes, the structure of the Public Force (as it was called in the 1978 and 1998 Constitutions was practically the same).

economic crisis registered in the country in its republican history. With this, the serious consequences that corruption could generate for the country's destinies were revealed. In this way, if to the harmful effects of corruption we add the ideology of discrediting and lumpenization of the State apparatus and public services coming from the ideas of the consensus promoted in Washington, the consequence of this ended up greatly affecting the state's authority as generator of development and progress. From this point of view, the judicial function and the National Police were the institutions most affected even up to today. ³⁰

Another interesting element to analyze during this period was the staging of the Anti-Narcotics Law (108) in 1991; the same one that marked the beginning of the fight against drugs in Ecuador promoted very insistently by the United States. This law, "draconian" from every point of view, punished people involved in illicit drug trafficking and/or related activities with 25 years in prison, thus demonstrating a unidirectional view of this complex issue and what would be years to come. late a re-hegemonization of security policies by the United States.

Finally, the 90's revealed the limitations of the risk prevention policy, which highlighted natural disasters.

The severe winter resulting from the El Niño phenomenon of 1998, which had already severely affected the country in 1983, generated one of the worst social and humanitarian crises on the Ecuadorian coast; which generated large losses to the country's economy and the forced migration of Ecuadorians abroad.

³⁰ According to surveys such as Latinobarómetro (2004), the judiciary and the National Police were the institutions but evaluated before public opinion and the issue of corruption was attributed as the fundamental cause of this problem. In this same survey, the Ecuadorian Police ranks third in Latin America, perceived as the most corrupt according to the perception of the people.

Graph 3: Security proposal 1995-2008 in Ecuador in millions of dollars

The decade of the 2000s in terms of security was marked by fundamental changes in Ecuador's security policy. With the end of the cold war at the end of the 1980s and the resolution of the old border conflict with Peru in 1998, a fundamental shift was generated in Ecuador's external security policy that was evidenced in two ways: the so-called "crisis existencial" of the military institution as a result of the loss of the historical reference of threat against national security; and a state divestment process for national defense³¹ (see graph 3).

Starting in the year 2000, with the implementation of Plan Colombia, Ecuador's perspective on security changed to the north.³² From this ³¹ This disinvestment had a rapid impact on the budget. As of 1998, defense spending ceased to be relevant to the national interest due to the resolution of the conflict with Peru; However, the budget decrease was also due to the cut in state spending in general as a result of the financial crisis of 1999 and 2000.

³² According to a survey carried out by Santiago Pérez in August 2008, approximately 65% of Ecuadorians see the Colombian conflict and the problems derived from it as threats to the external security of Ecuador.

In this way, the northern border (historically neglected by the State) began to be seen as a problematic and vulnerable place for the security of Ecuadorians due to the high transit of irregular groups from the Colombian conflict, the historical presence of illegal economies, the proliferation organized mafias and interpersonal violence historically generated as a means of conflict resolution. If to this we add the The war against drug trafficking initiated by the United States in the 1990s and the terrorist attack on September 11 in New York created the perfect scenario that marked the agenda of Ecuador's security policy throughout the 2000s.

This agenda was characterized by three things: 1) A re-hegemonization of US security policy and the return of neorealist positions in the Andean Region 2) the unidirectional military response to problems related to the Colombian conflict and the northern border; 3) the criminalization of irregular and illegal activities related to this sector.

In the first place, with the declaration by the United States in the 1980s that drug trafficking was a threat that threatened the National Security of that country, the importance of Ecuador in the regional scenario for the fight against drugs grew at the end of the 1990s despite not being a country of drug production historically.³³ This measure became more pronounced with the entry of Plan Colombia in the year 2000. In this context, Ecuador began to be considered a strategic place to carry out this fight, not only because of the characteristic of being a country of transit; but rather because of its key geographical position for the actions of intersection of drug shipments in other countries of the region. As a result of this, in the year 2000 the Manta Base was created; the same that was a clear demonstration of Ecuadorian submission to the dictates of US foreign policy in this period.

³³ Ecuador has been considered more of a transit country for drugs to the abroad.

On the other hand, this re-hegemonization came hand in hand with a high degree of cooperation from the United States in terms of monetary and logistical resources for the fight against drugs. These economic resources were concentrated mainly between 2000 and 2004 (the year with the highest level of cooperation) (see graph 4).³⁵ However, this US cooperation was basically focused on the ³⁴ Although US cooperation to Ecuador began to grow in total amounts and proportionally since the mid-1990s, reaching its maximum peaks in the first years of the application of Plan Colombia, its participation compared to the total amount of the region Andina is still marginal.

³⁵ This cooperation also had important increases in its share of total US cooperation in the Andean Region.

a militaristic and unidirectional vision of the matter;³⁶ the same one that had an important influence on the design of domestic policies. In this way, the most evident example was the construction of the new agenda and defense policy in Ecuador in 2002. This is how the threats related to the Colombian conflict became the central argument of the military discourse on security. national. Indeed, the Ecuadorian Armed Forces in the preparation of the White Paper showed the intention and the "need" to reconsider and go beyond the connotations of the National Security Doctrine towards the identification of new threats such as drug trafficking, terrorism, organized crime among other activities.³⁷

Finally, and as a sign of the criminalization effect, the need for close collaboration between military and police forces was also raised, which made it very difficult to separate the limits between the powers of these two institutions. Thus, while some critics long ago spoke of a militarization of police responses to problems of public order and security, in the 2000s they began to criticize the policing of military tasks, traditionally carried out to defend the external security of countries (control of interpersonal violence, confiscation of weapons, immigration control, control of sales of narcotic substances, etc.).

This criminalization effect was also evidenced in the creation of new you stereotypes of insecurity and criminality established from the arrival on the scene of Plan Colombia. In this sense, as a result of the increase in crime rates in large and medium-sized cities, ³⁷ Starting in the year 2000, Ecuador began to develop a government plan with the objective of promoting development programs on the northern border called UDENOR. The objective of this unit was to establish, with the support and financing of USAID, a coordinating entity for non-governmental organizations that work on development and social assistance issues on the northern border. In the year 200 this entity was renamed Plan Ecuador. In the first 6 years of operation, this entity received 80 million dollars in aid from the United States; which represents only 17% of the total aid received by that country in this period of time.

Since the mid-1990s, the Colombian conflict was seen as a potential threat to the citizen security of the country's inhabitants. Therefore, the northern border began to be conceived as the place where organized crime permeated, generating citizen insecurity.

This effect led to the generation of a social division of labor at the level of State security institutions regarding the control of public security. Thus, the police were relegated mainly to the control of the cities and the military dedicated itself to establishing a containment mechanism through the management and control of the border area. For example, while the Police in May 2008 had a presence in the border provinces with a total of 2,730 troops, which represents only approximately 6% of its personnel, the military forces are deployed in a number of approximately 12,000 troops, according to military sources. . This represents 31.5% of the total armed forces and 48.1% of the total land force.

The US hegemony regarding the criminalization of drug trafficking has not only become evident in the work of the police and military. At the level of justice, there was pressure (under the tutelage and support of ultra-conservative groups in Ecuador) to legislate in favor of tougher penalties and the establishment of laws that violate the fundamental rights of people. This is how in 2001 the sentence reduction system called 2 for 1 was eliminated and in 2003 the famous permanent detention was created, which constituted one of the greatest shames and legal aberrations that violated the right to due criminal process of inmates. On the other hand, at the judicial level, the pressure was evident in the speed and effectiveness of the cases of drug complaints.

38 As a result of the Colombian bombardment in Angostura, the military presence was redoubled in the area. Currently the number reaches approximately 12,000 members; however, in previous years this number oscillated between 7,000 and 10,000 troops.

Source: National Directorate for Social Rehabilitation (DNRS)

making that in the year 2007, approximately 81% of the denunciations have appeal to trial; which is greatly opposed to the reality of the judicial system in other types of crimes.

However, one of the institutions that received the greatest impact from this type of policy was the prison system. The serious impact of the penalties of the anti-drug policy of the 1990s, added to the suppression of the discount system and the implementation of the signature detention until the year 2006, generated that from the year 2002 the prisons of Ecuador begin to have an accelerated growth of its prison population that has led to recurring prison crises as a result of human rights violations, overcrowding,³⁹ lack of budget, etc. Paradoxically, this sector is the one that receives the least international aid or cooperation from the United States. (see graph 5) 39 Ecuador is the country with the highest levels of overcrowding in the Region Andina with around 200% in 2007.

Another problem that has also had great repercussions on the security of Ecuador during the 2000s is the issue of refuge due to fumigations to eradicate crops in border towns with Ecuador and the violence exerted as a result of the armed conflict in Colombia. This led to evidence of an unprecedented migratory dynamic in the country. According to the Foreign Ministry, Ecuador is the country with the largest number of refugees in Latin America. 97% of the refugees are of Colombian nationality. However, there are no exact figures on the number of Colombians who remain in Ecuador. Some indicate that there are 180,000, others 250,000, while others indicate that there are 550,000 Colombians; however, regardless of the number, this fact has turned Ecuador into a precedent for humanitarian cooperation in Latin America and in the entire world and the possibility of considering the country as a territory of peace.

Internally, the US security cooperation policy has gone against the process of police institutional reform and the justice sector. This cooperation was rather focused on potentiating certain areas of interest in these institutions. An example of them is the work that the Anti-Narcotics Police has sold in Ecuador, which has been a model of efficiency and professionalism at the international level. Similarly, other elite areas were developed within the police with extensive professional training coming from international cooperation such as: the Anti-Kidnapping Unit (UNASE), the Special Investigations Unit (UIES), the Operational Support Group (GAO), among other.

As a contradiction to this, the National Police as a whole did not have the adequate institutional development that would allow it to adapt to the new dynamics of managing public and citizen security in the current era. This despite the fact that in 2004, actions were undertaken for a necessary modernization of the National Police through the launching of the Strategic Plan for the Modernization and Comprehensive Transformation of the National Police of Ecuador 2004-2014. However, this Modernization Plan had limited scope since it did not have the necessary budget support. For this reason, there were many problems in the final execution of the Plan in terms of its scope of legal, administrative, financial, and procedural reforms. The Police continued to maintain a huge deficit, in physical infrastructure, logistics, lack of equipment, motor vehicles, weapons, among many other shortcomings.

In the same way, the justice sector did not receive the comprehensive support necessary for a better development of the penal reform process initiated in 2001. Justice in Ecuador still maintains a hybridity between the inquisitive and oral system that has prevented it from complying with the due process. On the other hand, the judiciary has had enormous difficulties in adapting to managerial procedures that allow it to be more effective in its levels of response to the population from a perspective of public good. To this must be added that until 2007, Ecuador lacked a public defender system that prevented it from developing a justice system focused on democratic values. In this sense, the institutional performance of justice and the police for crimes against drugs have remained in a glass bubble far from very different institutional dynamics.

This has contributed to increasing the levels of impunity and institutional discredit of the police and justice; which greatly affects the levels of perception of insecurity of the population.

Regardless of the dynamics of Plan Colombia and the northern border, another aspect to be highlighted during the 1990s was the growth in the security of private guard services in large cities and the participation of the Municipalities of Quito and Guayaquil in the management of citizen security in their respective cities. Indeed, with respect to the latter, the increase in citizen insecurity and crime in large cities made the local governments of Quito and Guayaquil begin to get involved in actions to address this social problem. These actions were sheltered under the premise that a large part of the solutions to the problems of crime and urban violence could be achieved through coordinated action between municipalities and the police in what has to do with the management and recovery of public space, rapprochement to the population, among other things; keys to preventive work. This issue was an enormous challenge for the National Police in terms of institutional management and ways of looking at the management of public and citizen security in Ecuador; the same thing that marked the birth of the Community Police.

However, Ecuador has not had legislation during this decade that establishes that the National Police of Ecuador must be accountable and obey the mayor of the city in planning and decision-making in policies related to the control and prevention of crime. . On the contrary, the legitimacy of local governments in this matter has been given more informally and spontaneously throughout these eight years. It was not until August 2005 that the Municipal Regime Law was amended by the Organic Law of the Municipal Regime where the concept of Citizen Security was introduced. In this way, the absence of an institutional framework that regulates the relationship of authority between local authorities and the National Police in matters of citizen security, caused that old dispute between the central and local governments of Quito and Guayaquil to be reactivated in Ecuador, mainly in the management, control and planning of certain crucial and relevant public affairs for the city, such as citizen insecurity.

The 2000s also once again exposed serious flaws in risk and disaster management policy. In January and February 2008, due to the sudden and severe winter on the country's coast, emergency systems were once again alerted due to severe flooding that caused enormous economic losses and poverty for the inhabitants. Likewise, few advances were made in terms of anti-corruption control that relegated the country for many years to being one of the countries classified as among the most corrupt.

In short, the decade of the 2000s was marked by fundamental changes in the priorities of security policies that was characterized by the presence of the Colombian armed conflict and the type of policy proposed as a solution to it, a clear hegemonic influence of external interests in the security policy agendas of the different governments in power in Ecuador, the little development of institutional reforms to defense, police, justice, and social rehabilitation institutions; and the entry of new forms and modalities of security management with the entry of local governments.

4.6 Unpublished fact to the violation of the security and sovereignty of the States: bombing of Angostura, Province of Sucumbíos, Ecuador by the Colombian government on March 1, 2008

Since the implementation of the Democratic Security Policy in 2002 by President Álvaro Uribe, a process of military recovery of Colombian territory began, which generated a withdrawal of the insurgent forces in the south of Colombia mainly. In this sense, as part of this military strategy, the Colombian government pressured the Ecuadorian government to act jointly in the military combat from Ecuadorian territory; which was about to materialize in the government of Lucio Gutiérrez. After Ecuador's refusal years later to get involved in a regionalization of the conflict because it was considered harmful to national interests, a series of diplomatic frictions arose as a result of permanent incursions by the Colombian military into Ecuadorian territory, and due to the affectation of border areas. product of the fumigation of glyphosates for the eradication of the coca leaf on the Colombian-Ecuadorian border, affecting the health, emotional stability of citizens and legal crops cough in Ecuadorian territory.

This tension reached its hottest point in March 2008 when one of the most serious violations of international treaties and peoples' sovereignty occurred; which has been an unprecedented event in Ecuadorian and Latin American history in recent times. Indeed, on March 1, 2008, a premeditated, unconsulted, and non-consensual bombardment was carried out in the town of Angostura in Ecuadorian territory by the Colombian government. This caused an energetic rejection and a forceful demand from the Ecuadorian government to the Colombian government and to the international community to condemn and reject the violation of our sovereignty; situation that led to the rupture of diplomatic relations with Colombia.

1. Son motivo de profunda preocupación para toda la región los acontecimientos que tuvieron lugar el primero de marzo de 2008 cuando fuerzas militares y efectivos de la policía de Colombia incursionaron en territorio de Ecuador, en la provincia de Sucumbios, sin consentimiento expreso del Gobierno de Ecuador para realizar un operativo en contra de miembros de un grupo irregular de las Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia, que se encontraba clandestinamente acampando en el sector fronterizo ecuatoriano.
2. Rechazamos esta violación a la integridad territorial de Ecuador, y por consiguiente reafirmamos el principio de que el territorio de un Estado es inviolable y no puede ser objeto de ocupación militar ni de otras medidas de fuerza tomadas por otro Estado, directa o indirectamente, cualquiera fuera el motivo, aún de manera temporal.
3. Tomamos nota, con satisfacción, de las plenas disculpas que el Presidente Álvaro Uribe ofreció al Gobierno y al pueblo de Ecuador, por la violación del territorio y la soberanía de esta hermana nación, el primero de marzo de 2008, por parte de la fuerza pública de Colombia.
4. Registramos también el compromiso del presidente Álvaro Uribe en nombre de su país de que estos hechos no se repetirán en el futuro bajo ninguna circunstancia, en cumplimiento de lo que disponen los artículos 19 y 21 de la Carta de la OEA.
5. Tomamos nota de la decisión del Presidente Rafael Correa de recibir la documentación ofrecida por el Presidente Álvaro Uribe y que habría llegado a poder del Gobierno de Colombia luego de los hechos del 1º de marzo, a fin de que las autoridades judiciales ecuatorianas investiguen eventuales violaciones a la ley nacional.
6. Recordamos también los principios, consagrados por el derecho internacional, de respeto a la soberanía, de abstención de la amenaza o el uso de la fuerza y de no injerencia en los asuntos internos de otros Estados, destacando que el artículo 19 de la Carta de la Organización de Estados Americanos prescribe que "Ningún Estado o Grupo de Estados tiene el derecho de intervenir, directa o indirectamente, y sea cual fuere el motivo, en los asuntos internos o externos de cualquier otro. V. The National Agenda for Internal and External Security

5.1 Towards a security, sovereignty and democracy policy for the 21st century

One of the internal problems of our countries manifests itself in fragile democracies that lack State policies that meet the basic needs of their population; which prevents the attainment of security conditions for its sustainable development. This situation has not been strange for Ecuador, given the validity for more than 30 years of neoliberal policies, in which systems of corruption, inequality and injustice predominated. Currently, this has changed in Ecuador. Starting in January 2007, the Ecuadorian population said "enough!" and elected the new Government of the Citizen Revolution.

However, in the 21st century, we are still facing a security policy that took as its model the national security doctrine of the United States, which made us dependent on a global agenda that is not based on the human being, but on hegemonic interests. Situation that the Ecuadorian people has proposed to change.

peace brigades

As a consequence, the proposal of a National Security Agenda that guides us towards a new Security, Sovereignty and Democracy Policy, reconsiders a set of visions and procedures that must shape the system of State-society and inter-state relations. The objective is to provide a stable scenario in the face of situations that could be generated by conflicts caused by vulnerabilities that are projected as threats (Bonilla-Cepik- 2004); that is, it is about outlining a new way of understanding the internal and external security of Ecuador.

5.2 Security in the current context of the Citizen Revolution

The proposal of the Ecuadorian Citizen Revolution, towards a new policy of security, sovereignty and democracy, is an unprecedented event in the country. This thesis, which has been collected from the different regional forums of the country that, with responsibility, creativity and citizen participation, have contributed to the construction of the National Agenda for Internal and External Security, is raises the challenge of 21st century security, to conceive it, not only as a matter of defense against internal or external threats, but as a constant dialogue between the different social groups and the institutions that make up the Ecuadorian State, in order to prevent, combat and provide actions to neutralize and/or eliminate threats that affect the living conditions of individuals, communities and national sovereignty.

Ecuador's thesis is comprehensive: it proposes going towards a new security policy that is based on human rights, the sovereignty of the peoples and democracy. This renewed concept of solidarity and integration is a contribution to the evolution of the analysis of sovereign security in all spheres of Ecuadorian State policy for the next generations.

Therefore, we rethink the traditional vision of the Doctrine of National Security, which has been in correspondence with the ideology of the "hegemonic" countries that have allowed them to justify their actions, thus sacrificing the responsibility of the States to protect security, of citizens in their daily struggle for survival, such as access to fundamental rights, security for development: education, health, justice, equity and the validity of a rule of law that safeguards and promotes the fundamental guarantees of human rights as the governing policy of the internal and external security system.

Multidimensional Scenario

This objective proposes a new multidimensional scenario where the theme is expanded both nationally and globally, as well as in the actors that are developing the Security Agenda. This security, which is built in a dynamic and inclusive way, promotes updating the guidelines as well as the respective actions to build an internal and external security system.

Dynamic, because it is not limited to rigidly established issues but rather to identify various vulnerabilities or threats that could affect different areas of the lives of individuals, which allows for long-term security policies that must be applied by the different state bodies .

Inclusive, because it is an agenda prepared based on the needs of citizens and their sovereign decision-making capacity on issues that affect them domestically, regionally, and internationally, thereby promoting human dignity, state sovereignty, and an identical memory Ecuadorian river.

The different security models lead us to identify those that are still valid in the current globalizing context, including human security. However, our proposal goes beyond the security models that emerge from conjunctural realities; Rather, we propose a model with a comprehensive vision, in which the human being as the central axis of security evolves towards a new thesis of security, sovereignty and democracy.

Next we expose the dimension of human security:

- It is a universal concern that covers all people around the world, whether they are from poor or rich countries. There are common threats to all: such as unemployment, drugs, crime, pollution and human rights violations.
- Its components are articulated among themselves: when there is a threat to human security, such as hunger, drug trafficking, diseases such as HIV-AIDS, terrorism, they move from the domestic agenda to the international stage to become an issue that involves all the nations of the world.

- Early prevention against threats such as natural disasters or social conflicts makes it possible to ensure better benefits for the people.
 - Our proposal is to promote prevention programs against threats of nature or internal conflicts, which will allow the country to be prepared for the protection of its population and for the design of public policies and a constitutional framework consistent with this objective that outlines a State Law for the challenges of the 21st century.
- Human security must center on the person. This element, understood as State policy, translates into providing guarantees to citizens so that they can choose their own development opportunities, have a decent quality of life and intellectual, economic, cultural, social and political growth.

5.3 Principle of participatory democracy

The security of the 21st century must be understood as a participative process, revitalizing the actors of civil society; of non-governmental organizations and State institutions that identify threats in order to establish action strategies and prevent them. The persistence of poverty, disparity or lack of access to basic services or economic and political opportunities are one of the causes of violence. The presence of insecurity phenomena decreases the degree of tolerance of the population, projecting itself, thus, in the scenarios of social conflicts that destabilize peaceful coexistence.

The change program of the current Ecuadorian National Government, to fulfill its promise of transformation, is stubborn in the construction Creation of new administrative instances of the Executive to energize the different areas of intervention. Regarding National Security, we have a new institutional structure: the Coordinating Ministry of the Internal and External Security, whose role is to coordinate and harmonize public policies, both internally and externally. In a systematic exercise, the Coordinating Ministry of Security has agreed on the main guidelines for internal and external security, together with the ministries and secretariats that make up the Coordinating Ministry, to promote the construction of the National Agenda for Internal and External Security that guide us towards a new policy of security, sovereignty and democracy.

5.4 The new security policy with a comprehensive approach

Towards a new policy of security, sovereignty and democracy, is the thesis that proposes a new line of sovereignty. A sovereignty that goes beyond legal concepts that frame it in visions of internal order; an international, territorial or theoretical presence of the State, in which the true actor is civil society with little visibility.

The 21st century requires comprehensive security, participatory democracy that encompasses the citizenry, and the organs of the Ecuadorian State, in order to preserve, protect and guarantee human dignity in all its context, providing quality of life to its citizens. inhabitants, based on the validity of human rights, the social rule of law, and the international one.

For this reason it is important to start our approach from the traditional conceptual inputs to understand how sovereignty has been conceived. Sovereignty, in its strict historical conception, refers to the ability of a national State to be recognized as such by other States. Sovereignty is, thus, an external gaze.

Fundamental guidelines to build the institutionality of Security as the guiding axis of public policies, plans and programs of state bodies:

- 1- Review of the institutional Mission and Vision
- 2- Preparation and/or review of Strategic Agendas
- 3- Articulation of programs and projects
- 4- Improvement of institutional infrastructure
- 5- Efficient budget management
- 6- Introduction of comprehensive security as a transversal axis in its institutional programs
- 7- Protection of national sovereignty and integrity of the State

Like security, the classical conception of sovereignty has an internal meaning that refers to the way in which the State is formally organized for its management of government; that is, for its institutional structure.

There is also the concept of "interdependent" sovereignty, which is related to cooperative mechanisms between States and allows regulating and complementing the flow of information, goods, capital, etc., which promotes integration mechanisms.

The sovereignty of the 21st century not only encompasses the meanings described, but also emphasizes a fundamental issue: the capacity of the Sovereign, that is, of the citizens, to outline their actions, their limits, their international policies.

internal, external and defense interests, as well as their interests. It refers to the fact that the citizen, invested with his power to choose, contributes to the construction of the Internal and External Security Agenda. In the particular case of external security, leaving behind a reactive practice to turn it into a propositional sovereignty for the region.

The sovereignty of States is the ability to guarantee not only their territorial integrity, but also the integrity and dignity of their citizens and of the population as a whole. The international scenario cannot continue to be considered as a game of asymmetries between powerful states that impose their interests on those that cannot resist. It is about showing that Ecuador is a country where borders act under the principle of sovereign and supportive peoples who fight transnational threats, such as those that threaten human stability, the rule of law and human development at the national level, regional and global.

Ecuador is part of a historical process of participatory sovereignty. Its citizens are the ones who identify their priorities and impose their rules of the game, defended and respected in the international context, in the face of the possibility of cooperation and in the negotiation channels against external aggressions. It is a sovereignty that promotes the protection of human life of sovereign States, under the notion of solidarity between citizens and peoples, which observes the principles of respect for human rights, freedom, justice, peace, and peaceful coexistence.

The concept of Comprehensive Security must promote urgent changes under the following democratic principles:

Increase and strengthen the sovereignty and dignity of the peoples and the sustainable stream.

- Territorial defense, defense and protection of the security of the human being, the right to their quality of life and the promotion of territories of peace.
- Strengthen democracy, the processes of change promoted by transformative governments that guarantee their constituents greater democracy, such as the Government of the Citizen Revolution of Ecuador, which is based on the defense of human rights, in a solidarity economy of producers and owners, equity and justice, the protection of the environment and natural resources in the force of international agreements.
- Make the inclusive principle the strategic axis to foster respect for gender, ethnic, intercultural and youth diversities, among other strategic aspects that make up the new vision of comprehensive security.
- Promote political security that is based on unrestricted respect for the Rule of Law, the Political Constitution of the Republic of Ecuador, democratic participation, and the reengineering of democratic political systems.

5.5 Basic guidelines for the Comprehensive National Security System

The Internal and External Security policy must be supported by the creation of the Comprehensive National Security System that is based on the multidimensional approach, to counteract, eliminate or neutralize , threats as well as for the peaceful harmonization of policies on governance, security human rights, public security, defense, sovereignty, the rights of the good life of the people that strengthen democracy, human rights and solidarity security among the peoples.

This system should also include as a support tool the institutional evaluation of its operational plans, multi-year plans and budgets, based on the strategic vision of the State and its comprehensive security. The plans are designed by each institution for the operation of their public policies that are in correspondence with the government plans and the directives of the Executive. Today these plans have an added value for their institutional management, which was achieved through this great exercise of dialogue and agreement with the citizenry, throughout the country. Therefore, the plans and programs must be in harmony and strategic articulation between one and the other based on the general comprehensive security policy. Thus, the new security, sovereignty and democracy policy is a permanent, harmonious and articulating exercise for the evaluation of plans and projects, and for the improvement of institutional public policies and comprehensive security in interaction with citizens.

For the articulation and interaction of citizens with the operational plans of government management, such as the Plan for the Modernization of the Police and Citizen Security, the participants in the Forums Regions have raised, urgently and with citizen interest, that citizens be empowered in the planning, evaluation and monitoring of these plans, in order to build the principle of citizen co-responsibility in eliminating the causes of violence.

The Internal and External Security Agenda of the 21st century is contextualized within the fundamental principle that there can be no democracy without the preservation, protection, guarantees and exercise of rights that are framed within the identity protection of memory, cultural heritage and the environment; that is, the citizen will not only have the ability to exercise their civil and political rights, but this security must guarantee second and third generation rights: social, economic, and cultural rights; health, education, the rights of migrants, free mobility, and other aspects that are interrelated with development.

SAW. Guidelines for Sectoral Public Policies for Internal and External Security

6.1 Democratic Methodology of the Security, Sovereignty and Democracy Agenda.

The democratic methodology consists of the participatory work of the representatives of different sectors of civil society, local authorities, democratically elected, as well as representatives of the different State institutions on the internal and external security of the country, and the geographical territoriality in places of greater perception of insecurity.

The call to citizens for dialogue and agreement was conceived as the ideal methodological principle to guarantee the democratic participation of all sectors in order to shape and work on the seven security issues, whose execution corresponds -for the moment- to the ministries that make up the Sectoral Cabinet of the Coordinating Ministry of External and Internal Security:

- Ministry of Government and Police
- Ministry of Foreign Affairs

- Ministry of National Defense
- Ministry of Justice and Human Rights
- National Anti-Corruption Secretary
- Technical Secretary of Risk Management
- Technical Secretary of Plan Ecuador

This process was coordinated and directed by the Technical Secretariat of the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security with the support of a cadre of seven coordinating professionals (one for each institution that makes up the Security Cabinet) knowledgeable about the issues discussed and institutional management. , who were contracted for this purpose, including the realization of the Regional Forums, the systematization of the results by themes, and for advice on the articulation of the institutional agendas included in the attached fascicles; same that were supported at the same time by a logistics coordinator at the national level.

The methodology consisted in the development of fundamental work tools, such as:

- 1- Carrying out a national survey on the perception of citizens on security issues.
- 2- The systematization of the management actions of the institutions of the Cabinet of the Coordinating Ministry of Internal and External Security to incorporate the concept and vision of integral security within its institutional strategic agenda, identifying integral security as a transversal axis in its management.
- 3- The realization of the Regional Forums as a tool to call for citizen participation to know their contributions, criticisms and visions on the subject of security in relation to Public Security and Governance, Foreign Policy, Defense, Justice and Human Rights, Anti-Corruption , Risk Management and Ecuador Plan.

REGIONAL FORUMS

The Regional Forums, in turn, were conceived as the fundamental mechanism of citizen participation at the national level, since they were conceived as a meeting between the citizen and the State, to discuss and feed the proposal of the Internal Security Agenda. and External.

In order to guarantee geographic representation, the territorial geographic areas in which there is a higher incidence of insecurity were identified, which made it possible to establish the venue for the meeting to have the greatest participation of citizens, local governments, representatives of local organizations belonging to the different provinces of the country.

Second: Formation of work tables: The dialogue tables were formed by thematic area on security with the participation of around 25 people each table, (in some forums more than 2 tables were developed due to the high number of participants in certain thematic areas), which were classified according to the following themes:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Institutional Trust

The institutional trust index is calculated on the basis of a scale with the values "A lot", "Some", "Little" and "Not at all", which are used to calculate a single value with the formula $((A \text{ LOT} * 2) + \text{SOMETHING}) - ((\text{NONE} * 2) + \text{LITTLE})$.

The National Government ranks first in the institutional trust table, with 18.5 points, followed by the Armed Forces (18.2) and Civil Defense (12.4).

The other institutions with a sufficient degree of confidence at the national level are the Municipalities, the Provincial Councils and the Constituent Assembly.

A second block of intermediate confidence (-21 to -40) is occupied by the ministries of Defense, Foreign Relations, Government and Justice and Human Rights.

The institutions with a low degree of confidence (less than -52) are the National Police and the Governments of Venezuela, the United States and Colombia.

The Ministry of Internal and External Security, Plan Ecuador and the Anti-Corruption Secretariat are not sufficiently well known, so the confidence index is not very applicable.
